25. FAMILY TREES

Each family tree shows the reported children, parents, grandparents and great-grandparents of a family group. In order to reduce redundancy, any family group which is wholly included within another family tree may not be reported separately.

Above each of the great-grandparent boxes (top row), a continuation family tree reference number is shown if the great-grandparent is recorded as a child in the continuation tree. A continuation reference number is also shown to the left of a grandparent or parent box if that individual has siblings reported in the continuation tree; and beneath a child box (bottom row) if that individual has children reported in the continuation tree.

In cases of multiple marriages, a continuation reference number preceded by "=" is shown to the right of a parent box. This number references the previous and/or next tree in which that individual is shown with another partner.

In cases of adopted (or fostered) children, the parental connection is shown with a dashed line and a continuation reference number preceded by "=" is shown within the individual's box. This number references the tree in which that individual is shown with his or her natural parents.

1. "1851 England & Wales Census" in "MyHeritage"
   What can you find in the census?Census returns can help you determine who your ancestors were, and can also tell you:- Where your ancestors were living- Who they were living with- What their occupations were- If they had any servants- Who their neighbours were- If they had any brothers and sisters- What their ages were at the time of the census- If they had any disabilities.As well as giving you the above information, the fact that census returns are taken every ten years also allows you to track the movements of your ancestors through time as they perhaps move house, get married, have children or even change occupations.The fields which have been transcribed for the census are:- First name- Middle name- Last name- Sex- Birth place- Age- Place of residence- County- Relationship to head of householdWhy this collection is so valuableCensus records are valuable since they can tell you where a person lived at a certain place and time. Censuses were conducted by the federal government and will offer a variety of information, depending on year. Census records can answer questions like where your ancestors were living at the time the census was taken, who they were living with, what their occupations were, who their neighbors were, if they had any brothers and sisters, what their ages were at the time of the census and if they had any disabilities.Searching the censusThe golden rule of family history is to check the original historical record, or 'primary source', wherever possible. We have provided clear images of the original census enumeration books for you to view once you've found the right family in the indexes. When using census returns you should first search the transcriptions to help locate your ancestor in the census, and then view the original images to validate your findings. It will also help you see the household in the context of surrounding households. This is particularly important as transcribing an entire census is a huge and difficult task, and whilst we have used the expertise of our transcribers and the experience of key representatives from the genealogy community to help us translate the records, it is inevitable that there will be some errors.Next stepsWith the information you gain from these census records, you will have the information you need to search for vital records in the locality where you found your ancestor. Also, the fact that census returns are taken every ten years also allows you to track the movements of our ancestors through time as they perhaps move house, get married, have children or even change occupations.

5. "Australia, Business Register" in "MyHeritage"
   The Australian Business Number (ABN) is a unique 11-digit identifier used to identify and track businesses operating in Australia. It was introduced by the Australian government in 2000 as a means of simplifying business registration and reducing the regulatory burden on businesses.Any business that is operating in Australia or that has Australian customers is required to have an ABN. The ABN is used for a range of purposes, including taxation, invoicing, and government registration. It is also used by other businesses and organizations when dealing with the business, such as when providing goods and services or entering into contracts.The records in this collection are © Commonwealth of Australia 2020.

6. "Australia, Victoria Death Index, 1836-1985" in "MyHeritage"
   The bulk of the records begin in 1853 — the year civil registration began in Victoria. Information provided in this index can be used to purchase a copy of the full death record; uncertified copies (downloadable images) can be purchased and downloaded from the Births Deaths Marriages Victoria website. Obtaining a copy of a full death record is important because it will likely list additional information about the deceased and his or her death.

53. "U.S. Social Security Applications and Claims, 1936-2007" in "MyHeritage"
Starting in 1936 the Social Security Administration started to maintain records of each individual who applied for a Social Security Number. The earliest form of these records were known as the "Master Files of the Social Security (SSN) Holders and SSN Applications". This was more commonly known simply as the "Enumeration System". In the 1970s legacy records from this system were migrated and new records were maintained electronically in the Numerical Identification System (NUMIDENT). This collection contains records of individuals with a verified death between 1936 and 2007 or who would have been over 110 years old by December 31, 2007. There are three types of entries in NUMIDENT: applications (SS-5), claims, and death entries. The records of applications and claims are presented here in this collection. The death entries are available on MyHeritage as the U.S. Social Security Death Index (SSDI). The application (SS-5) records contain information extracted from the SS-5 form "Application for a Social Security Card" or "Application for Social Security Account Number." Information in the NUMIDENT application entries include applicant's full name, father's name, mother's maiden name, sex, race/ethnic description, place of birth, and other information about the application and subsequent changes to the applicant's record - such as name changes especially common (and even required) when women marry. For about 43 percent of social security numbers, there are multiple application records. The application records preserved by the Social Security Administration do not include records of all social security applications between 1936 and 2007. Information of applications prior to 1973 may be incomplete. There may not be a record for an individual in both the application records and the death entries and there are nearly 6 million social security numbers in the application records that do not appear in the death entries. And conversely, there are records in the death entries that have no corresponding extant record in the application entries. The claim records include information on the type of claim, the claimant's full name, date of birth, gender, and for about half of the claim records the US state or country of birth. For a small number of social security numbers there are multiple claim records. Records in this collection may have place names that were abbreviated or personal names that were truncated in the data supplied by the Social Security Administration. MyHeritage has corrected and expanded many of these when possible but other values remain abbreviated or truncated.

54. "U.S. Social Security Death Index (SSDI)" in "MyHeritage"
Begun in 1935 by the Social Security Act signed into law by FDR, more than thirty million Americans were registered for the economic security sanctions by 1937. From 1937 to 1940, payments were made in one-lump sums amounts with the first amount being seventeen cents. Following amendments in 1939, the payments turned into monthly benefits and increased. Following further amendments in 1950, cost-of-living increases were awarded to those who were receiving benefits. From 1950 to the present, benefits have increased yearly in response to inflation concerning the costs of living.

What is beneficial ownership transparency?

What are beneficial owners?

A beneficial owner, sometimes called an ultimate beneficial owner, or UBO, is how we describe the real, human owners of corporate vehicles (such as companies). They are the people who can benefit from its operations and profits, or control its activities: the people at the top of the ownership chain.

A beneficial owner is a person who ultimately has the right to some share of a corporate entity's income or assets, or the ability to control its activities. Often, the ownership structure of companies and other corporate vehicles, like trusts, can be complex and opaque. This means that the individuals who own, control, or benefit from corporate vehicles can remain hidden.

If the beneficial owners are hidden, then governments don't know who is bidding for a contract, companies don't know who they are doing business with, society doesn't know who is financing a new political party, and law enforcement can't fight money laundering and other cross-border financial crimes.

What is beneficial ownership transparency?

Beneficial ownership transparency, or BOT, is an area of policy reform. It refers to governments putting in place requirements for corporate vehicles to collect and disclose information about their beneficial owners in a register. Governments collate this information in central registers, and make it available to a range of actors, including law enforcement, tax authorities, the private sector as well as civil society.

These actors use the information for many different purposes. These include improving public procurement and taxation, improving the ease of doing business, and preventing corruption.

This booklet provides an introduction to beneficial ownership transparency (BOT). It also includes an overview of the ways in which Open Ownership is driving the global shift towards transparency and accountability in corporate ownership and control.

Corporate ownership: Rights and responsibilities

Owning or controlling a corporate entity comes with rights, such as limiting liability, as well as responsibilities to customers, shareholders, governments, regulators, and other businesses. Knowing the beneficial owner of a company helps identify where decisions are made and who should be held accountable.

Beneficial ownership differs from legal ownership. Companies can own or control other companies, and in this case they are known as legal persons.

Shell companies

Companies that only exist on paper, and that do not have any real operations or employees, are sometimes referred to as shell companies. Creating a shell company in a jurisdiction without company ownership disclosure requirements and transferring stolen assets to this company makes it difficult to follow the money between the stolen assets and their anonymous owners.

Shell companies in these jurisdictions facilitate organised crime, corruption, and tax evasion by making their owners anonymous. Setting up shell companies in multiple jurisdictions can make investigations even more complicated and challenging, as it allows people to pick and choose laws from different countries to suit their purposes. A study by the World Bank found that 70% of grand corruption cases studied involved the use of anonymously owned companies.

Shell companies in these jurisdictions facilitate organised crime, corruption, and tax evasion by making their owners anonymous.

Global momentum on beneficial ownership transparency

Making more of this information available to those who can use it effectively helps solve issues around corporate accountability and illicit financial flows. BOT is gaining momentum globally, with over 130 countries committed to implement reforms. The Financial Action Task Force (FATF), the G7, the G20, the International Monetary Fund (IMF), the UN, and the World Bank also support BOT. As do varied actors that both disclose and use beneficial ownership information.

In practice, this means more jurisdictions are requiring corporate vehicles to disclose information on their beneficial owners in order to make this information available to law enforcement or the general public. However, in some countries, accessing information on real owners can still be challenging. This can be because they have not yet implemented reforms, or because they have implemented them poorly.

Ceremonial Welcome of the New President - Speech After Swearing In Justice Kirby Collection

Author: The Hon Justice Michael Kirby AC CMG President, Court of Appeal, Supreme Court of NSW (1984 - 1996)
Type: Speech
Subject: Law
Organisation: Soloman Islands Court of Appeal
Location: Soloman Islands

THE HON JUSTICE MICHAEL KIRBY AC CMG *

Your Lordship the Chief Justice, your Lordships, Attorney-General, President of the Solomon Islands' Bar Association, Your Excellencies, ladies and gentlemen.

I am very conscious of the honour you have done me by inviting me to take up the office of President of the Court of Appeal of Solomon Islands. I have just been sworn into office at Government House by His Excellency the Governor-General (Sir Moses Pitakaka). I express thanks for the warm welcome which Their Excellencies extended to me at Government House and to you for the welcome now received in this courtroom.

This is the ninth time that I have taken the Oath of Allegiance to Her Majesty the Queen and the Judicial Oath; but it is the first time that I have taken such an oath to the Queen in her capacity as Queen of Solomon Islands. These are repeated and timely reminders of the fact that those who lead also serve.

This ceremony is the fourth time in which I have been welcomed to a new judicial office. The first was long ago in December 1974 when I was appointed as a Deputy President of the Australian Conciliation and Arbitration Commission. In 1983 I was welcomed as a Judge of the Federal Court of Australia. In 1984 I was welcomed as President of the New South Wales Court of Appeal. And now, I have the honour to preside in this Court.

At my welcome in the Supreme Court of New South Wales, the words of praise and reassurance from the assembled Bench and Bar were hardly still in the air but I was whisked away to preside in the busy motion list of that Court. Indeed, I have a feeling that, if he could have done so, the Judge who organised the welcome ceremony in 1984 would have had me disposing of motions during that ceremony. Things are not so different in Solomon Islands. Within a few minutes of the close of this ceremony, I will be busily at work hearing my first appeal. Appeal courts around the Commonwealth, it seems, are invariably busy places But it is no bad thing to mix ceremony and work. And to remember that each has its place in the law: but that work has primacy.

I wish to pay tribute to Your Lordship the Chief Justice. Sir John Muria has made me feel most welcome in the company of the judiciary of Solomon Islands. From the time he first approached me in relation to this office to this day, he has shown friendship and brotherly cooperation. So have the other judges of the Court whom I have met, his Lordship Mr Justice

Savage and his Lordship Mr Justice Palmer. In time, I will come to know all of the Judges of the Court and this will be a great experience for me.

I must also pay tribute to the warmth of the welcome extended by the Attorney-General and Government of Solomon Islands and by the Bar. In a common law country, such as Solomon Islands, the Bar comprises persons who are absolutely essential to the proper working of the system. They assist and support the Judges in the exposition and development of the law. I look forward to working closely with them and I express thanks for their welcome.

I should also pay tribute to my distinguished predecessor, Mr Justice Peter Connelly. He served on this Court from 1982 until this year. From 1987 to the conclusion of his service, he was President. Since the offer of my appointment I have spoken with him. He has given me every encouragement and support as I assume this office. I know from speaking with him that he retains a special corner of his heart for Solomon Islands and its people. He spoke most warmly of the privilege of serving in this office.

The opportunity to sit in a court comprising Judges of common law countries around the Pacific is a great occasion to realise our shared traditions. If only there had been more imagination at an earlier time, it might have been possible to build a Privy Council sitting in our region, comprising Judges of the Commonwealth countries of our region. This opportunity slipped through the fingers of distracted leaders who lacked the imagination at a time when it was possible. But here in the Solomon Islands Court of Appeal we have built a truly trans-Pacific court. The Judges come from Solomon Islands, Australia, New Zealand, Papua New Guinea and beyond. Sitting with each other, and working with each other, will provide new insights into our own legal systems which can only be of benefit to the law as a servant of the people in this part of the world.

The Chief Justice has mentioned that one of my tasks is to be Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations for Human Rights in Cambodia. What a contrast exists between the stable institutional arrangements of the law in Solomon Islands and Australia and the instability in Cambodia, born of revolution, war, genocide and invasion that has been Cambodia's recent history. The Khmer Rouge, which instituted the period of genocide, hated law and killed judges and lawyers. They sought a society without law. They began again with a "year zero". In such a society there remains the law of power. The law of the gun. How much better it is to resolve conflicts in courtrooms than by bloodshed and violence.

In Cambodia I have been engaged in the training of the new judges. Most of them were formerly teachers. They are striving to recreate in their country what we, to a large extent, can take for granted: the institutions of the administration of justice.

Reflecting upon this contrast in the tasks that have engaged me within the space of two succeeding weeks, brings home to me (as I hope it does to all who hear these words) the blessings which we enjoy, living in a society ruled by law. The Judges especially are aware of the many faults of our legal system: principally of delay, cost and practical inaccessibility of justice to many. But for all those many faults, there are great blessings which we should daily count. They include the independence of the judiciary from the other branches of government; the existence of an uncorrupted judiciary deciding cases on its merits; the energy of a vigorous legal profession standing up for its clients' rights with courage and determination; the acceptance of fundamental human rights and the enshrinement of those rights in the constitution and the laws; the principle of the rule of law itself which permeates all laws and institutions and sustains our societies; the existence of orderly reform of the law and the vision of the law as a means of defending and advancing social justice. We, the current judges and legal practitioners, must strive to be worthy of the strengths of the system. Whilst it is in our charge, we should bend our efforts to sustain and strengthen these features which we have inherited.

The full impact of my appointment to this office did not really strike me until I was in church yesterday. I attended the morning service at the Cathedral Church of St Barnabas in Honiara. A thousand congregants joined in a service of great spiritual force. When the choir proclaimed the first hymn, I was arrested by the magnificent singing - the harmonies of the Pacific joined in the praise of the Lord. The choir of this cathedral has no rival in any church that I have attended in the Commonwealth, unless it be at Westminster Abbey.

The Dean of the cathedral commenced the service with prayers for the Judges and the Magistrates of Solomon Islands. His sermon was shorter than these remarks - a great blessing in a cleric. He emphasised, in the context of the Church, a message which is of significance for the judges. He urged the importance of putting substance over form. He described the way in which the Church can often make the mistake of giving primacy to form rather than substance. It was a message particularly apt for a new Judge and I shall take it to heart.

At the end of the service, although he did not know us or why we were there, the Dean asked Justice Savage, his wife and me to stand to be greeted. And greeted we were with applause of friendship from the assembled congregation.

The important feature of the service which immediately attracted my attention was that not a single expatriate officiated in its conduct. The churches are stronger in Solomon Islands because they have taken root, deep and permanent, in the fertile soil of these Islands. No cyclone and no human intervention can ever remove this inherited work of spiritual missionaries. So it must be with the law. The work of legal missionaries must finish. The common law must be planted deep and strong in the soil of Solomon Islands. Its institutions must, before long, draw exclusively upon the people of Solomon Islands. Then its survival and advancement will be sure indeed.

And so we conclude this ceremony and turn to work. I will, in the words of the oath which today I have taken for the ninth time, perform my duties without fear or favour, affection or ill-will. This is a promise I have made to the people of Solomon Islands. The period during which I hold this office, whether it be long or short, will be devoted to the fulfilment of that promise. The words of praise and thanks that I have received this morning are greatly appreciated by me. The privilege of service is mine. I shall do my best.

No. XXVIII.

AN ACT to amend the Laws relating to Masters and Servants.

[Assented to, 18th March, 1892.]

Preamble.

WHEREAS it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to Masters and Servants: Be it enacted by the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Legislative Council and Legislative Assembly of Western Australia, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, as follows:—

Short Title.

1. THIS Act may be cited for all purposes as "The Masters and Servants Act, 1892."

Repeal of Masters and Servants Acts 1842, 1868, and 1886:— 6 Vic., No. 5, 32 Vic., No. 8, 50 Vic., No. 20.

2. THE Act passed in the 6th year of the reign of Her Majesty, number 5, entitled "An Act to provide a summary remedy in certain cases of Breach of Contract," and "The Masters and Servants Amendment Ordinance, 1868," and "The Masters and Servants Amendment Act, 1886," are hereby repealed, except as to anything lawfully done thereunder; and this Act shall apply to all contracts, services, and employments made and entered into before the passing of this Act in respect of which no proceedings have, before the passing of this Act, been taken or instituted under the said repealed Acts, and all proceedings under such repealed Acts which may be pending at the time of the passing of this Act shall be continued, prosecuted, and completed as if this Act had not been passed.

Interpretation of terms.

3. IN this Act the following words and expressions shall have the several meanings hereby assigned to them, unless there be anything in the subject or context repugnant to such construction:—

The word "employer" shall include any person, firm, corporation or company, who has or have entered into a contract of service with any servant, workman, clerk, artificer, laborer, apprentice, or other person, and the steward, agent, bailiff, foreman, or manager of such person, firm, corporation, or company:

The word "employed" shall include any servant, workman, laborer, clerk, artificer, apprentice, or other person, whether under or above the age of twenty-one years, or whether a married woman or not, who has entered into a contract of service with any employer, either at salary or wages, or for any remuneration, whether in money or otherwise, or to perform work at a certain price by the piece or in gross:

The words "contract of service" shall include any contract between employer and employed, whether in writing or by parol, whereby the employer agrees to employ and the employed agrees to serve for any period of time, or to execute any work, and any indenture of or agreement for apprenticeship, whether such contract, indenture or agreement shall have been made or entered into before or after the passing of this Act, but subject to the provisions of the 2nd Section hereof as to proceedings pending at the passing of this Act on any contract, indenture or agreement made or executed before the passing of this Act:

The word "parties" shall include the employer and employed under any contract of service:

The word "writing" shall include printing:

The word "property" shall include all real and personal estate and effects used and employed under or affected by any contract of service or operations under the same, and any other real and personal estate belonging either to employer or employed.

Upon breach of contract, complaint may be made to a Justice.

4. WHENEVER the employer or employed shall neglect or refuse to fulfil any contract of service, or the employed shall neglect or refuse to enter upon or commence his service according to the contract, or shall absent himself from his service, or whenever any dispute, question, or difference shall arise as to the rights or liabilities of either of the parties, or touching any misusage, misconduct, ill-treatment, or injury to the person or property of either of the parties under any contract of service, or touching the loss or destruction of such property, the party feeling aggrieved may lay an information or complaint in writing before a Justice of the Peace, setting forth the ground of complaint, and the amount of wages, compensation, damage, or other remedy claimed for the breach or non-performance of such contract, or for any misusage, misconduct, ill-treatment, or injury to the person or property of the person complaining, or for the loss or destruction of such property; and upon such information or complaint being laid, the Justice taking the same shall issue, or cause to be issued, a summons to the party so complained against, setting forth the grounds of complaint, and the amount claimed for wages, compensation, damage, or other remedy as set forth in the said information or complaint, and requiring such party to appear at the time and place appointed in such summons, before any two or more Justices of the Peace, to answer the matter of the information or complaint, so that the same may be then and there heard and determined.

A summons to be issued.

If summons is disobeyed, a warrant may be issued.

5. WHENEVER the party complained against shall neglect or refuse to appear to any summons as aforesaid, a Justice may, after due proof on oath of the service of such summons, issue a warrant for the apprehension of such party, in order to the hearing and determining of the matter of the information or complaint.

In case of intention to abscond, security to be found for appearance.

6. IF at any time after the laying of the information or complaint it appears to a Justice that the party complained against is about to abscond, the Justice may issue a summons requiring the party complained against to appear before a Justice at a time and place therein appointed (such time being not later than twenty-four hours, exclusive of Sunday, from the date of the last mentioned summons), and to find good and sufficient security by recognizance or bond, with or without sureties, to the satisfaction of a Justice, for his appearance to answer the information or complaint; and if the party complained against fails to appear at the time and place so appointed, a Justice may issue a warrant for his apprehension, and if such party on appearing on the last-mentioned summons, or on being so apprehended, fails so to find security, a Justice may order him to be detained in safe custody until the hearing of the information or complaint; but on his so finding security he shall be set at liberty.

Justices may order the contract to be ful-

7. UPON the hearing of any information or complaint under the provisions of this Act, the Justices hearing the same, after due filled or annulled, or may make other order.

examination and upon proof of the matter of such information or complaint, by an order in writing under their hands, in their discretion, as the justice of the case may require, shall either make an abatement of the whole or of any part of the wages or other remuneration then already due to the employed, or shall direct the fulfilment of the contract of service with a direction to the party complained against to find forthwith good and sufficient security by recognizance or bond, with or without sureties, to the satisfaction of a Justice for the fulfilment of such contract, or shall annul the contract, discharging the parties from the same and apportioning the amount of wages or remuneration due up to the completed period of such contract; or where no amount of compensation or damage can be assessed, or where pecuniary compensation will not, in the opinion of the Justices, meet the circumstances of the case, shall impose a fine upon the party complained against, not exceeding in amount the sum of Twenty pounds, or shall assess and determine the amount of compensation or damage together with the costs to be made to the party complaining, inclusive of the amount of any wages or remuneration abated, and shall direct the same to be paid accordingly.

In default of fulfilment of contract, Justices may order imprisonment;

8. IF the order shall direct the fulfilment of the contract and shall direct the party complained against to find good and sufficient security as aforesaid, and the party complained against shall neglect or refuse to comply with such order, a Justice may, if he shall think fit, by warrant under his hand, commit such party to any gaol, there to be confined and kept until he shall so find security; but nevertheless so that the term of imprisonment, whether under one or several successive committals, shall not exceed in the whole three months: Provided, always, that the Justices hearing the information or complaint as aforesaid may, if they think fit, assess and determine the amount of wages, compensation, or damage to be paid to the party complaining, and direct the same to be paid, whether the contract is ordered by them to be annulled or not; or, in addition to the annulling of the contract of service and discharge of the parties from the same, may, if they think fit, impose a fine as hereinbefore authorised: Provided, always, that no apprenticeship indenture or agreement shall be annulled except upon proof of ill-treatment of the apprentice by the master, or incompetency on the part of the master to teach such apprentice, or wilful neglect so to teach such apprentice, or incorrigible misconduct on the part of the apprentice: Provided, also, that the Justices if they rescind or annul any agreement or indenture of apprenticeship may, if they think fit, order the whole or any part of the premium paid on the binding of the apprentice to be repaid to the person or persons paying the same: Provided also, that nothing herein contained shall authorise the Justices to adjudicate where the amount claimed exceeds Fifty pounds, or to make an order for the payment of any sum exceeding Fifty pounds (exclusive of the costs incurred in the case), or to require security to an amount exceeding Fifty pounds from any defendant or his surety or sureties.

And may assess compensation.

Enforcement of recognizance or bond for fulfilment of contract.

9. WHEN it is alleged by any party to a contract of service that the condition of a recognizance or bond entered into or given for the fulfilment of the contract under the provisions of this Act has not been performed, any Justice being satisfied thereof, after hearing the parties and the sureties (if any), or in the absence of any party or surety not appearing after summons in that behalf, may order that the recognizance or bond be enforced for the whole or part of the sum thereby secured as to the Justice may seem fit, and the sum for which the same is so ordered to be enforced shall be recoverable accordingly in a summary manner.

Recovery of money by distress, and imprisonment in default.

10. WHERE on the hearing of any information or complaint under this Act an order is made for the payment of money and the same is not paid as ordered, the same shall be recovered by distress of the goods and chattels of the party failing to pay, and in default thereof by imprisonment of such party; but no such imprisonment shall be for more than three months or be with hard labor.

Imprisonment to be in discharge of compensation.

11. FROM and after the expiration of the term of any such imprisonment as aforesaid, the amount of wages, fine, compensation, or damages, together with the costs so assessed and directed to be paid by any such order as aforesaid, shall be deemed and considered as liquidated and discharged, and such order shall be annulled accordingly, and the said parties exonerated from their respective obligations under the same. Provided always, that no wages or any portion thereof which may be accruing due to the employed under any contract of service after the date of such order shall be assessed under any such order or warrant of distress, or be seizable or arrestable under the same.

Application of fines and moneys recovered.

12. WHEN the Justices impose a fine or enforce any sum secured by a recognizance or bond under this Act, they may, if they think fit, direct that a part not exceeding one-half of such fine or sum when recovered shall be employed to compensate an employer or employed for any wrong or damage sustained by him by reason of the act or thing in respect of which the fine was imposed, or by reason of the non-fulfilment of the contract of service. If they shall not so direct as aforesaid, the whole of such fine or sum shall belong to Her Majesty, her heirs and successors, for the public uses of this Colony.

Punishment for aggravated misconduct, &c.

13. WHERE on the hearing of an information or complaint under this Act it appears to the Justices that any injury inflicted on the person or property of the party complaining, or the misconduct or ill-treatment complained of has been of an aggravated character, and that such injury, misconduct, or ill-treatment has not arisen or been committed in the boná fide exercise of a legal right existing, or boná fide and reasonably supposed to exist, and further that any pecuniary compensation or other remedy by this Act provided will not meet the circumstances of the case, then the Justices may, by warrant, commit the party complained against to gaol, there to be (in the discretion of the Justices) imprisoned, with or without hard labor, for any term not exceeding three months.

Dishonored cheques.

14. WHEN any wages or money due for work shall be paid to any employed by any cheque, draft, order, or note in writing upon any bank or any person, and shall be dishonored, no employed shall thereby be deprived of any remedy given to him by this Act for the recovery of his wages, but every such person shall be entitled to recover such reasonable damages as he may have sustained in consequence of the dishonor of such cheque, draft, order, or note, and such damages shall be recoverable as wages.

Agents and partners to be considered as principals.

15. WHEN any contract of service shall have been made by, or any work shall be entrusted to, the management or superintendence of the steward, agent, bailiff, foreman, or manager of any employer, and also where two or more persons shall carry on business as partners, in every such case respectively the like proceedings shall be had by or against such steward, agent, bailiff, foreman, manager, or any one or more of such parties, and shall be as effectual, for all the purposes of this Act, as if the same had been had by or against the principals or all the parties: Provided that when any such proceeding shall be had against a steward, agent, bailiff, foreman, or manager in respect of any cause of complaint, not being for personal misconduct, all sums of money paid or satisfied by such steward, agent, bailiff, foreman, or manager, by virtue of any order of the Justices made in pursuance hereof, shall be recoverable by him against the employer from whom the same is adjudged to be due, or shall be allowed to him out of any money at the time of payment or afterwards in his hands belonging to such employer.

Married women and infants.

16. WHEN any married woman or infant under the age of twenty-one years shall have cause of complaint in any of the cases provided for by this Act, such complaint may be lodged and all further proceedings thereupon had by and in the name of such married woman or infant, or of the sureties of the infant in any agreement or indenture of apprenticeship, or of any person nominated by such infant, and all such proceedings shall be as effectual, valid, and binding as if such married woman were sole or such infant were of full age.

17. THE provisions of this Act shall apply to all contracts of service by indenture or other written agreement made by any employer in the United Kingdom or in any of the dependencies or colonies thereof, or in foreign countries, with persons about to proceed to or actually resident within the Colony of Western Australia, for service in this Colony: Provided such contracts be not contrary to any law of the Colony relating thereto.

Application of Act to contracts made elsewhere for service in Western Australia.

18. UPON the hearing and determining of any information or complaint between employer and employed, and on any appeal, under the provisions of this Act, the respective parties to the contract of service, their husbands or wives, shall be deemed and considered as competent witnesses for all the purposes of this Act.

Parties to the contract of service to be competent witnesses.

19. NO wages or other remuneration shall become payable to, or recoverable by, any party for or during the time of his imprisonment under any warrant of committal under this Act.

Wages not payable during imprisonment.

20. NO levy shall be made for any wages or other remuneration due by an employer who has been adjudged bankrupt subsequent to such wages becoming due, and any employer imprisoned for non-payment of wages, and afterwards becoming bankrupt, shall be discharged out of custody, so far as respects the non-payment of such wages, so soon as he shall have been duly adjudged bankrupt.

Proviso as to bankruptcy.

21. NOTHING in this Act shall prevent employer or employed from enforcing their respective civil rights and remedies for any breach or non-performance of the contract of service by any action or suit in the ordinary courts of law or equity, in any case where proceedings are not instituted under this Act.

Nothing in this Act to prevent proceedings by action.

22. NOTHING in this Act contained shall authorise any Justice to exercise any jurisdiction in the case of any employed who shall be in the service of such Justice, or in any case in which such Justice may be directly interested.

Justices not to have jurisdiction over their own servants.

23. NOTHING in this Act shall interfere with the usual and accustomed mode of procedure in any court of criminal jurisdiction for the trial of indictable offences, relating to wilful and malicious injuries to persons or property committed by masters, workmen, servants or others, either at common law or under the several statutes made and now in force for the punishment of such offences, but so that no person shall be twice prosecuted for the same offence.

Saving for criminal informations or indictments.

24. WHENEVER in any Ordinance or Act now in force reference is made to any of the Acts or Ordinances hereby repealed, the same shall be held to mean and apply to this Act.

Application of this Act to other Acts.

No objection to be allowed for defect in forms.

25. THE several forms in the Schedule hereto, or forms to the like effect, shall be valid and sufficient in law, and no objection shall be taken or allowed for any alleged defect therein, either in substance or in form.

Summary procedure.

26. ALL proceedings under this Act before Justices shall be conducted and regulated according to the provisions of an Act passed in the 14th year of the reign of Her Majesty, number 5, and entitled "An Ordinance to facilitate the performance of the duties of Justices of the Peace out of sessions within the Colony of Western Australia, with respect to summary convictions and orders"; and of any Act amending or altering the same, or for the time being in force with respect to the duties of Justices in that behalf, except so far as the same are altered by this Act.

Appeal to Supreme Court.

27. ANY party who shall feel himself aggrieved by any conviction or order under this Act may appeal therefrom to the Supreme Court of Western Australia or to any Judge thereof, and the Court or Judge shall have power to reverse, vary, or otherwise deal with such conviction or order, and to make such further or other order with respect thereto, under and according to the provisions of this Act, and to the costs before the Justices and of the appeal, as to the Court or Judge may seem fit, and such appeal shall be had according to the usual practice in appeals from the summary convictions and orders of Justices, or to such rules and orders of the Supreme Court as are applicable thereto.

Non-application of Act.

28. THIS Act shall not apply to any aboriginal within the meaning of "The Aborigines Protection Act, 1886," nor to seamen nor to apprentices to the sea service, nor shall it affect any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts or of any Act regulating the Pearl-shell Fisheries or of "The Aborigines Protection Act, 1886."

No imprisonment of woman or girl.

29. NOTHING in this Act contained shall authorise the imprisonment of any woman or girl.

Incorporation of Sections of "Shortening Ordinance."

30. SECTIONS C., G., and H. of "The Shortening Ordinance, 1853," shall be incorporated with and taken to form part of this Act to all intents and purposes, and in as full and ample a manner as if the said sections had been introduced and fully set forth in this Act.

In the name and on behalf of the Queen I hereby assent to this Act.

ALEX. C. ONSLOW, Administrator.

Appendix 1 – WA Government Position on ALRC Questions and Proposals

Introduction

The Western Australian (WA) Government welcomes the opportunity to provide a submission in response to the Australian Law Reform Commission (ALRC) Review of the Future Act Regime established under the Native Title Act 1993 (Cth) (NTA). This submission addresses key issues and areas of concern from a WA perspective, some of which are referenced in the Issues Paper and the Discussion Paper published by the ALRC in November 2024 and May 2025 respectively.

The first three sections of this document address a range of technical and administrative challenges that are of priority importance for WA, whilst also responding to broader issues likely to be experienced across jurisdictions. These issues are grouped under the following topics:

- Native Title Sector Capability
- Agreement-Making
- Complexity and Workability of the Future Acts Regime

The balance of the submission provides a WA Government position on the reforms set out in the Discussion Paper, followed by a series of 'Proposals' and 'Questions' the WA Government says should be considered as alternative reforms (if the proposed reforms outlined in the Discussion Paper do not proceed).

The submission considers the WA Government's overlapping responsibilities in relation to the Future Acts Regime. The WA Government acts variously as:

- A proponent and/or negotiation party that both undertakes and facilitates future acts such as the grant of land tenure under State land administration and resources legislation;
- A regulator that oversees the complex intersections between the NTA and State legislation to ensure compliance with future act processes and procedural requirements;
- A State Government representing and balancing the (sometimes competing) interests of the broader Western Australian community, including the Aboriginal community, industry, and other stakeholders.

This multifaceted role requires the WA Government to navigate legal obligations, promote development, regulate land use, and respect the rights of native title holders through transparent and inclusive governance. The views expressed in this submission are informed by, and speak to, these various roles. They reflect the WA Government's commitment to ensuring that the Future Acts Regime operates in a way that is legally robust, procedurally fair, and responsive to the diverse interests and responsibilities it is required to balance.

This submission has been developed through consultation with the ALRC and in close consultation with WA Government agencies that administer land use regimes and native title policy settings and engage with native title holders and other participants in the native title system.

WA Context

The majority of determined native title is located within WA. As of 15 October 2024, there were 3.5 million square kilometres of determined native title. WA represents 1.9 million square kilometres or 53 percent of that total area, with more than half being exclusive possession native title, the highest form of recognition under the NTA.

By comparison, the State of Victoria only has 16,335 square kilometres of land subject to native title and New South Wales has even less at 10,022 square kilometres. Queensland, the jurisdiction with the second largest area of native title at 682,189 square kilometres comes to only 19 percent of the national area.

As a consequence, the amount of activity on land subject to native title in WA dwarfs activity in other jurisdictions. For this reason, comparing processes in WA to those of other States and territories runs the risk of assuming those processes would function well in the WA context.

WA is in the latter stages of a transition to a post-determination landscape:

- There are currently 87 Prescribed Bodies Corporate (PBCs) in WA covering around 77 percent of WA's landmass. This increases to approximately 87 percent when including the six South West Native Title Settlement Regional Corporations and the Yamatji Southern Regional Corporation;
- A number of registered claimant applications remain unresolved, which once resolved, may bring the number of PBCs in WA to over 100;
- WA has over one million square kilometres of determined, exclusive Native Title rights and interests, representing 92 percent of the national total;
- Of the existing 81 PBCs in WA:
    - Approximately 60 percent are in the Pilbara and Kimberley regions;
    - Almost half are classified as 'small' by the Office of the Registrar of Indigenous Corporations;
    - Approximately 60 percent have a reported annual income of $1 million or less; and
    - Approximately 50 percent have no paid employees.

The WA Government acknowledges the significant impact of the Future Acts Regime in the broader context of the NTA and the complex responsibilities it places on native title holders (and claimants), proponents, and other stakeholders. The renewed focus on the Future Act Regime presents an opportunity for the Commonwealth Government to address long-standing and emerging issues related to, or triggered by, the NTA.

Executive Summary

1. Native Title Sector Capability: WA's native title landscape is vast and complex, with over 87 PBCs managing rights across 77% of the State. Many PBCs face significant capability and resourcing challenges, including limited funding, a predominately volunteer workforce, and high consultation demands. These constraints undermine the effectiveness of the Future Acts Regime and must be addressed through structural reforms and increased Commonwealth investment.

2. Agreement-Making Challenges: The current agreement-making environment is marked by procedural uncertainty, inconsistent practices, resourcing constraints, and limited access to precedents. These factors hinder fair negotiations and delay project delivery. The WA Government supports agreement-making as the preferred approach but calls for clearer guidance, streamlined processes, and equitable funding arrangements to support meaningful engagement.

3. Complexity and Workability: The intersection of the NTA with WA's legislative frameworks creates a fragmented and burdensome regulatory environment. Compliance requires coordination across multiple agencies and legislative instruments, often resulting in delays and legal uncertainty. The WA Government highlights the need for reforms that simplify processes without compromising native title rights.

4. Position on Proposed Reforms: The WA Government supports reforms that enhance transparency, efficiency, and procedural clarity, including:

    - Expanded use of standing instructions
    - Improved access to agreements
    - Centralised registers and data systems
    - Strengthened PBC support and funding

    However, it strongly opposes reforms that:

    - Introduce an impact-based model for future acts
    - Extend the scope and duration of the Right to Negotiate
    - Repeal the Expedited Procedure
    - Establish Native Title Management Plans as an alternative procedure

    These proposals are legally uncertain, administratively burdensome, and incompatible with WA's regulatory environment.

5. Alternative Reform Proposals: The WA Government proposes practical alternative reforms to improve the Future Acts Regime, including:

    - Enhanced structural, governance and funding support for PBCs
    - Alternative reforms to the Right to Negotiate and the Expedited Procedure
    - Amendments to clarify treatment of low-impact acts and mining renewals
    - The introduction of electronic notifications and standardised notice formats
    - Establishment of an independent body to provide advice on compensation
    - Clear guidelines and oversight for cost recovery mechanisms

6. Interaction with Aboriginal Cultural Heritage Legislation: The submission emphasises the need for better integration between the NTA and cultural heritage frameworks to reduce duplication, improve coordination, and ensure respectful engagement with Traditional Owners, noting the different scope of the Aboriginal Heritage Act 1972 (WA) and the role of other Aboriginal people who are not native title holders in the management of Aboriginal cultural heritage.

1.0 Native Title Sector Capability

The capability and resourcing of the Native Title sector as a whole is critical to the operation of the Future Acts Regime in WA. Capability and resourcing gaps exist across the system, which hinder the current operation of the Future Acts Regime. If left unaddressed, these gaps will undermine any attempt at reform.

The ALRC's Issues Paper and Discussion Paper highlight the significant challenges faced by PBCs in meeting their obligations under the NTA, the Native Title (Prescribed Bodies Corporate) Regulations 1999 (Cth) (PBC Regulations) and the Future Acts Regime. These challenges are driven by insufficient investment in foundational governance and support for their ongoing operations; complex statutory obligations and regulatory burdens; and onerous consultation demands. The following is an overview of these challenges:

- A unique corporate, organisational and regulatory context – This includes:
    - Meeting perpetual and permanent obligations to manage land and fulfil cultural obligations, driven by complex cultural, social and environmental factors that are unique to each native title holding group;
    - Maintaining sustainable capability and organisational memory with a workforce that (in up to half of WA PBCs) is exclusively composed of volunteer directors who must balance legal obligations, community expectations, cultural protocols and their own livelihoods; and
    - A lack of clear guidance on the core statutory functions of PBCs (noting the comments of Barker J in Stevens v Wintawari Guruma Aboriginal Corporation RNTBC [2016] FCA 149 at [59]).
- High demand – The extent of Native Title recognition and the volume of land activity throughout WA contributes to a high volume of future acts generally, but particularly concentrated on certain regions (e.g. the Pilbara and the Goldfields).
- Inadequate baseline funding – Basic Support Funding provided by the National Indigenous Australians Agency does not adequately cover the basic costs of operating a PBC, let alone the base operational costs associated with responding to future acts.
- An operational funding gap – Baseline funding is intended to be supplemented by cost recovery mechanisms (including under section 60AB of the NTA). However, a reliance on a cost recovery model has created an operational funding gap that has driven inefficiencies, created perverse incentives, and inhibited development.
- Knowledge gaps – There are significant gaps in basic operational knowledge of the Native Title system that exist across PBCs, industry and government. Despite the Native Title sector in WA attracting a range of consultancy and advisory firms with legal, anthropological, economic and social policy experience, there remains a shortage of expertise across the board to support both native title holders and other parties under the Future Acts Regime.

- Sector conduct issues – While many of these firms provide a positive contribution to the Native Title sector, the lack of consistent professional or industry standards creates confusion and contributes to ongoing challenges for PBCs. This, combined with the lack of dedicated training and support for PBCs and other participants in the sector, creates the conditions for exploitative practices and inefficiencies.
- Economic diversification and new industries – Proponents from new and emerging industries (including their internal and external advisors) have often very limited knowledge of Native Title, let alone the Future Acts Regime. There are different profiles of resource intensiveness, capability and ultimately profitability that attach to different industry sectors (for example tourism vs. extractive mining). There are also different attributes of proposed projects (and components of projects) which may have different impacts on country, risk profiles, business models and future act implications (for example a power transmission line vs. a power generation facility). Much of this is unknown during the preliminary stages of new types of projects.

2.0 Agreement-Making in Western Australia

The sectoral challenges outlined above are compounded by a lack of transparency, consistency, precedent, and guidance that presents an inconsistent but often poor background environment for agreement-making. The following are the key contributors to this dynamic:

- Native title rights and interests are sui generis – Determining fair and reasonable compensation for impacts on these rights and interests attributable to future acts is challenging due to the limited jurisprudence and lack of established precedents, which leave parties without clear guidance or benchmarks. The valuation process is further complicated by the need to account for both economic loss and cultural or spiritual impacts, which are inherently difficult to quantify and can be managed or mitigated through the agreement-making process. This, combined with procedural uncertainty and inconsistent negotiation practices, contributes to a lack of clarity and fairness in compensation outcomes.
- Limited access for PBCs and other parties to precedent agreements – Without access to past agreements or relevant jurisprudence, parties face significant barriers to determining reasonable terms or minimum standards that enable negotiations to take place on an equal footing, restricting the capacity for free, prior and informed consent.
- Inconsistent approaches and outcomes across different regions, industries, and proponents – The absence of standardised processes and guidance leads to variability in negotiation practices, agreement terms, and compensation levels, creating uncertainty for all parties and undermining confidence in the Future Acts Regime.
- Uneven dynamics between PBCs and proponents – Disparities in access to resources, information expertise, and institutional support creates imbalances between negotiating parties, exacerbated by the under-resourcing of PBCs and expectation gaps created between proponents across higher and lower-capital sectors.

The WA Government supports agreement-making as the preferred approach to resolving all native title matters, including those arising under the Future Acts Regime. This commitment aligns with the principles of the WA Government's Aboriginal Empowerment Strategy 2021–2029 and Closing the Gap Jurisdictional Implementation Plan. Though the WA Government recognises the importance of agreement-making to a fair and equitable Future Acts Regime, the open-ended nature of Indigenous Land Use Agreement (ILUA) processes in particular can frustrate the overall intent of the NTA and sits uneasily alongside other validation provisions. Proponents (including State and Territory Governments) are therefore drawn between an open-ended and uncertain process with limited statutory or judicial guidance and a closed system that offers limited procedural rights to native title holders and ongoing uncertainty as to compensation liabilities (including when and how those liabilities will be realised).

The uncertain environment in which future act agreement-making currently takes place is one of the main drivers of the significant costs incurred by native title parties, government and proponents in engaging with the Future Acts Regime, and a key reason for the capacity constraints within the sector.

With this in mind, the WA Government has identified three practical issues that should be addressed as part of improving the Future Acts Regime:

1. The WA Government utilises funding agreements (and in some cases grant agreements) as the primary vehicle to support native title party participation in agreement-making. These agreements often also serve as a de facto negotiation protocol. Settling these agreements often becomes a negotiation in itself, which is resource and cost intensive for both parties. Guidance on reasonable processes and costs that also accounts for customary obligations and traditional decision-making protocols would reduce uncertainty and the resource burden of negotiating funding agreements.
2. Related to the above point, the capability gaps of PBCs (and to a lesser extent, Native Title Representative Bodies and Service Providers – NTRBs/SPs) outlined above often result in PBCs seeking to pass on significant operational costs to proponents through funding agreements and negotiation protocols. This can delay substantive negotiations and create significant barriers for proponents, particularly for lower scale and/or capital proponents and in new and emerging industries.
3. The lack of consistent guidance on the costs of supporting native title party participation in negotiations and a predominately 'user pays' engagement model places proponents in competition with one another in terms of access to PBCs. This places certain industries (in particular, lower scale and/or capital industries) at a disadvantage, given they lack a financial 'buffer' to deal with higher levels of uncertainty. This is likely to inhibit the growth and development potential of these sectors in WA. Similarly, competition for access to PBCs can constrain the capacity of proponents (including the WA Government) to pursue agreement-making approaches for essential public works and infrastructure.

The lack of baseline funding and reliance on cost recovery models means that proponents often find themselves subsidising the operational costs of PBCs, rather than meeting the costs of the service being provided. Whilst the WA Government recognises that section 60AB of the NTA establishes a ‘user pays’ model, the administrative burden and additional costs of negotiating and managing individual funding agreements is substantial for both parties. Reliance on cost recovery mechanisms to support the day-to-day operations of a PBC creates its own set of inefficiencies and ultimately increases the administrative burden on PBCs and other participants in the system, especially considering the uneven distribution of future acts across a particular jurisdiction.

Greater certainty and consistency in key aspects of the agreement-making process, such as timelines, documentation requirements, and dispute resolution mechanisms, would work to benefit both native title holders and proponents. The WA Government acknowledges and provides commentary on the proposed reforms identified in the Discussion Paper in later sections of this paper, but suggests that these reforms do not sufficiently address the lack of process certainty.

Uncertainty around compensation and commercial benefits in future act negotiations also presents a significant challenge for the WA Government across its roles in the native title system. The absence of jurisprudence and clear guidance on what constitutes fair and reasonable compensation complicates negotiations, particularly where governments are simultaneously responsible for initiating future acts, regulating land and resource use, and representing the broader public interest. These overlapping roles create tension between legal obligations, policy objectives, and stakeholder expectations. The current provisions of the Future Acts Regime offer limited support in navigating these complexities, impairing the parties’ ability to negotiate confidently, delaying project delivery, and undermining trust with Traditional Owners and other stakeholders.

In the absence of jurisprudence, a clear and consistent framework for determining compensation and commercial benefits for future acts (or native title compensation generally) would improve certainty, fairness, and transparency in the native title system. A framework that has the effect of establishing an objective concept of value would help all parties engage in negotiations with a shared understanding of what constitutes fair and reasonable compensation. It is equally important to ensure that this does not inadvertently create a de facto floor or ceiling. However, a well-designed framework could balance clarity with adaptability, supporting equitable outcomes without constraining genuine negotiation.

3.0 Complexity and Workability of the Future Acts Regime

Over 90 percent of WA is Crown Land, much of which is subject to Native Title rights and interests. The interaction between the NTA and State legislation in WA creates a highly complex and fragmented regulatory environment.

Achieving full compliance with the Future Acts Regime, requires a never-ending process of interpretation and alignment of procedural requirements across multiple interrelated legislative frameworks, administered by approximately 20 different WA Government agencies, Statutory Authorities and Government Trading Enterprises.

This highly complex operating environment places a substantial burden on the WA Government, industry proponents, and PBCs alike. This is exacerbated in circumstances where reforms to State legislation can be characterised as legislative future acts, even where there is no clear relationship to a physical impact on native title rights and interests (notwithstanding that there may be a spiritual and/or cultural impact unknown to the WA Government). This situation, which is a function of the intersect between the NTA and State legislation, makes it difficult for the WA Government to innovatively adapt and/or modernise State laws. The WA Government must engage with this complexity while ensuring that native title rights and interests are respected (including entitlements to compensation), regulatory obligations are met, and economic development (and diversification) is not unduly hindered.

These challenges impact the efficient functioning of the Future Acts Regime and the WA Government's role as a statutory regulator (across approvals for land, mining, water and environment), with multiple layers of approval and consultation involving native title parties. Specific examples include:

Land Administration Act 1997 (LAA)

- Crown Land Access: Access to Crown land in WA is regulated via the LAA, triggering procedural requirements under the Future Acts Regime (either via section 24LA or more substantive procedures, including ILUAs). The requirement to obtain tenure before undertaking feasibility work means that proponents often cannot clearly articulate project benefits until that work is complete, yet are required to engage in substantive negotiations upfront, leading to misaligned expectations and compromising free, prior and informed consent.
- Granting land tenure for third parties: The WA Government faces a complex challenge under the NTA when issuing land tenure that constitutes a future act, as it bears default liability for ensuring compliance with native title procedures, even when the future act benefits a third party. This places an administrative and compliance burden on the WA Government, requiring its active involvement in notification, negotiation, and agreement-making processes to avoid invalid tenure and potential compensation claims. A key example is where, to mitigate residual liability, the State must insert itself into ILUA negotiations, to ensure that third-party beneficiaries do not expose the WA Government to legal or financial risk.
- Compulsory acquisition: The WA Government regards compulsory acquisition of native title rights and interests as a last resort, pursued only when all reasonable negotiation avenues have been exhausted and the future act is deemed essential for the broader public benefit (with reference to relevant statutory requirements). Where native title is affected and is for the benefit of a third party, such acquisitions trigger the Right to Negotiate (RTN) under the NTA, requiring strict procedural compliance and good faith engagement with native title parties. The inflexible and highly prescriptive legal framework surrounding compulsory acquisition acts as both a safeguard for native title rights and a disincentive for the State to pursue this pathway routinely, given the complexity, risk of compensation liability, and the need to uphold community expectations and legal integrity.

Mining Act 1978

- Procedural certainty and validity issues: Cases such as Forrest & Forrest v Wilson (2017) 262 CLR 510 highlight the risk of native title invalidity arising through State regulatory processes, with changes to State legislation unlikely to create sufficient certainty and/or avoid legal challenges without complementary federal legislation.

- Pass through provisions: Section 125A of the Mining Act 1978 (WA) is and has been the subject of legal challenges, and the ability for the WA Government to 'pass through' a future act compensation liability has not been the subject of judicial consideration.

Rights in Water and Irrigation Act 1914 (RIWI Act)

- Relationship to other approvals: Water licences in WA are granted in the context of other approvals related to land use, development and tenure. The practical operation of the Future Acts Regime creates ambiguity in terms of procedural requirements and in some cases procedural validity in the context of the high number of water licences (over 12,000) held across WA.
- PBC capability: PBCs may not have the specialist capacity to assess water impacts under the same methodologies as the WA Government, limiting opportunities for meaningful engagement.
- Unclear Status of Instruments: There is ambiguity around whether non-statutory Water Management Plans and proclamation processes constitute or directly engage procedural requirements under the Future Acts Regime.

4.0 WA Government Position on Proposed Reforms

The WA Government considers that broader reforms, particular to the resourcing of the native title system, are needed to ensure the Future Acts Regime operates fairly, transparently and effectively. In particular, the WA Government strongly supports the forms of PBC resourcing outlined in the Discussion Paper and suggests that any reform of the NTA should be accompanied by a substantial increase in Commonwealth funding to PBCs.

The WA Government supports reforms that improve agreement-making, access to information, and procedural clarity, but opposes reforms that will introduce significant administrative burdens, delay State approval processes, or create uncertainty for the WA Government and its stakeholders. Any reforms to the Future Acts Regime must be carefully balanced against the operational realities of administering State legislation to achieve full compliance with the Future Acts Regime, in a jurisdiction with extensive Crown land and a complex post-determination landscape such as WA.

Irrespective of the particular reform proposals recommended by the ALRC or taken forward by the Commonwealth Government, the WA Government stresses the need, highlighted by the issues identified in this submission, for the implementation of any reforms to consider:

- A significant lead-in time and transitional arrangements to minimise disruption and avoid stakeholders losing confidence in existing or new processes;
- A significant uplift to training and capability to ensure a seamless transition between the existing and reformed processes; and

- A considerable investment by the Commonwealth Government in PBCs as part of any implementation pathway that permanently uplifts their baseline capability to adequately reflect their existing and any new, potentially enhanced role in a reformed Future Acts Regime.

The WA Government is committed to constructive engagement with the reform process and must be a part of the implementation pathway for any reforms recommended by the ALRC or proposed to be taken forward by the Commonwealth Government, to ensure a detailed assessment of their legal, financial, and operational implications in WA.

The WA Government's position in relation to each individual Question and Proposal from the Discussion Paper is included as Appendix 1 to this submission.

4.1 Supported Reforms

The WA Government supports those reforms identified in the Discussion Paper that aim to improve the transparency, efficiency, and workability of the native title system (in particular, those that could be implemented to improve the operation of the Future Acts Regime in WA, with minimal disruption). These include the following Proposals and Questions:

Proposal 1 – Expanded Use of Standing Instructions

If implemented, this proposal has the potential to streamline agreement-making by reducing repeated authorisation processes, improving efficiency for low-impact future acts. It also addresses process inefficiencies and costs associated with PBC-led future act proposals.

Care must be taken to ensure standing instructions are legally robust and clearly scoped, to avoid misuse or duplication of authorisation processes. A monitoring mechanism should be considered to track implementation across PBCs and agreement types.

Proposal 2 – PBC Access to Agreements

If implemented, this proposal has the potential to enhance transparency and empower PBCs by backing up and supporting their corporate memory and record-keeping.

A key consideration for this proposal should be implementing clear protocols for timely and secure transfer of agreements; clarifying responsibilities for data management; and ensuring the systems maintained by the National Native Title Tribunal (NNTT) are compatible and equipped to manage access.

Proposal 3 and 4 – Automatic Removal of Expired ILUAs and Periodic Audit of ILUAs

If implemented, this will improve the accuracy of the Register, as well as improving transparency and clarity in relation to future act consents.

A key consideration for this proposal should be providing sufficient time and support for the NNTT to assess the administrative burden and practical implementation process (including back capture) as well as providing adequate resources for ongoing compliance. A minor consideration is the extent to which this will require detailed input from the WA Government, in which case sufficient time and support should be extended to relevant WA Government agencies in providing information to assist implementation.

Proposal 11 – Central Register of Future Act Notices

The WA Government notes that this proposal is aligned with work it is currently undertaking to develop contemporary, whole of government policy settings for future acts. This approach includes centralised reporting and data management for future acts undertaken by the WA Government. Consideration should be given to ensuring that any centralised register is required to capture information spatially, even if this is not the primary mechanism for recording data.

Proposal 15 – NTRB/SP Support for PBCs

This reform, if correctly targeted and implemented, will strengthen PBC capacity to respond to future act notices, facilitating a more effective operation of the Future Acts Regime.

A key consideration for implementing this proposal should be clarifying the funding scope (with particular reference to the statutory functions of PBCs) and any required reporting and/or auditing which could impact the operational funding gaps outlined in the preliminary parts of this submission. Coordination with WA Government support programs for PBCs should also be a strong consideration to avoid duplication and/or missed opportunities.

Proposal 16 – Fund the National Native Title Tribunal

This reform, if implemented comprehensively, will enhance the NNTT's ability to manage their existing responsibilities. However, the WA Government expresses concern that the other proposals advanced and reforms explored in the Discussion Paper will require a substantial uplift in, and considerable expansion of, the NNTT's resourcing and capability to avoid uncertainty and delay.

Workload implications must be considered in detail and sufficient investment in resourcing made, monitored and adjusted as needed should any of the proposals in the Discussion Paper be implemented.

Question 12 – Public Register of Agreements

This reform, if implemented, will improve transparency and consistency, as well as potentially creating de facto guidance for agreements.

The WA Government suggests mandatory publication of agreements is considered, with redaction options for sensitive content agreed by the parties to the agreement (ie. an opt out rather than opt in approach with respect to published content).

Question 20 – Retention of Alternative Procedures

Retaining sections 43 and 43A of the NTA preserves flexibility for States and Territories to legislate tailored future act procedures, maintains jurisdictional autonomy and allows for processes that meet the needs of individual PBCs.

A streamlined process to obtain the approval of the Commonwealth Minister should be considered to ensure barriers to the use of these provisions are minimised. Commonwealth consideration should be limited to ensuring that alternative procedures are legally robust and do not conflict with federal legislation.

Question 23 – Content of Future Act Notices

This reform could improve the quality of information provided to PBCs, aiding informed decision-making without imposing excessive burdens.

Care should be taken in defining any minimum content standards and the impact on existing State legislation and processes. Confidentiality and the disclosure of third-party information should be part of these considerations.

Question 25 – Interaction of Future Act Payments and Compensation

The WA Government supports this reform only if payments are clearly offset against compensation entitlements to avoid duplication, do not result in an overpayment of compensation and have a clear intersection with the operation of existing provisions of the NTA, such as sections 24EBA(4) and 49.

Question 27 – Costs Awards for Future Act Matters

This reform, if implemented, promotes fairness by recommending that each party bear its own costs in Federal Court proceedings.

The Discussion Paper notes jurisprudence from WA that raises the prospect of amending section 85 of the NTA to specifically apply to future act proceedings. There is an expectation from many that section 85A applies to any proceeding arising under the NTA, so the WA Government supports that being clarified via amendment.

4.2 Reshaping the Statutory Procedures

The Discussion Paper outlines a suite of reforms aimed at modernising and streamlining statutory procedures under the NTA (Proposals 6 – 10; Questions 14 – 22 and 24). The WA Government acknowledges the intent to improve procedural efficiency, enhance fairness in agreement-making, and support the effective participation of native title parties. However, this is outweighed by two overarching and interrelated concerns.

Firstly, the WA Government's firm view is that the proposed reforms cannot be implemented in a way that maintains confidence in the integrity of the Future Acts Regime. The proposed reforms are not only inherently uncertain but also represent a fundamental departure from the principles that underpin the existing regime, which will create additional legal, administrative, and commercial uncertainty.

Secondly, the reforms would require wholesale amendments to WA legislation, including to address the pass-through of compensation liability, which is an unacceptable burden to place on the WA Government and risks contributing further to uncertainty and issues with process integrity.

The WA Government's position on individual Proposals and Questions is as follows:

Proposal 6 – Right to Negotiate

The WA Government does not support extending the negotiation period to 18 months or the proposed moratorium, and expresses concern about the broader reform proposal.

In the context of the existing RTN, there is no demonstrated need to extend the minimum period for negotiations. Over the past 10 years, the average time between notification and the lodgment of a Future Act Determination Application is approximately three years and six months, with a median of two and a half years. By requiring a longer minimum negotiation period, the proposal risks significant delays for the mining and exploration sector, particularly in circumstances where the inability to reach agreement is unconnected to the impact of the future act on native title rights and interests, or where a determination is required because parties have been unable to meet the formal requirements of a section 31 agreement.

The proposal to expand the scope of the RTN, either through the impact-based future act provisions or the Native Title Management Plan (NTMP) concept, would also create a substantial impact on other tenure grants, including for critical infrastructure and regional service delivery in WA, including essential services to remote Aboriginal communities. The reform could also deter investment in projects of national and State significance that, if negotiated successfully, could provide substantial benefits to native title holders.

Alongside the extended negotiation period, the proposed moratorium would in practice create an effective veto, and is likely to be in conflict with WA legislation (e.g. Mining Act priority rights) and may lead to legal challenges from proponents who had a legitimate expectation that their applications would proceed, for example, in the event of forfeiture.

Proposal 7 – Referral of Isolated Issues to National Native Title Tribunal

This proposal requires further investigation and extensive consultation with the WA Government. This should include assessing how binding determinations during negotiations could affect the operation of State legislation and processes, as well as workload impacts for key WA Government agencies.

Proposal 8 – Removing the Ban on Royalty-Based Conditions

The WA Government does not support this proposal as it will likely lead to overcompensation, require complex valuation and commercial expertise that does not currently reside within the NNTT, create commercial uncertainty and expose the State to significant financial risk, especially when combined with the impact-based future act provisions and the NTMP proposal. It would also leave open the possibility that commercially unviable conditions could be imposed on future acts that are inherently unprofitable, including public infrastructure.

Proposal 9 – Repeal the Expedited Procedure

The repeal of the Expedited Procedure is strongly opposed by the WA Government. Doing so would have a significant impact on the mining and exploration sector, creating significant uncertainty, delay and additional costs that will likely hinder new and ongoing investment in exploration and restrict the pipeline of new mining projects.

The proposal would also create significant administrative and resource burdens for PBCs, considering the volume of exploration applications granted annually in WA. While the Discussion Paper also proposes reforms to PBC resourcing, this would likely overwhelm PBCs at their current capacity levels and would require substantial additional resourcing and time to ‘scale up.’

By way of illustration – in the last five years, 9,774 tenements were notified with an Expedited Procedure statement, in response to which 5,661 objections were lodged with the NNTT, with 4,693 tenements progressing to grant without objection. If the Expedited Procedure were repealed, applicants would be required to enter into an RTN process with one or more PBCs for each of those tenements, which would compound existing capacity issues within the PBC sector.

The WA Government is concerned that the existing RTN is an overly cumbersome process for what are, in most cases, low impact and ephemeral land uses, especially when considering the volume of exploration titles granted in the WA context. Repealing the Expedited Procedure would place unworkable administrative burdens on all parties and introduce significant delays and costs that would make a substantial number of exploration projects unviable and overwhelm the capacity of PBCs and other native title parties.

In this regard, there are currently 137 applications for exploration and prospecting licences under the Mining Act in the RTN that have been in the process for an average of three years and nine months, while 20 exploration and access authorities under the Petroleum and Geothermal Energy Resources Act 2006 have been in the RTN for an average of six years and 10 months. The oldest unresolved exploration licence application in the RTN was first notified in February 2014, more than 11 years ago.

Proposal 10 – Procedural Compliance as a Condition of Validity

The WA Government notes this reform, combined with the proposal to introduce statutory remedies for invalid acts, would require significant resourcing to ensure high levels of technical compliance. Other suggested reforms, including an ‘impact-based’ assessment of future acts, have the potential to create additional ambiguity and uncertainty, increasing risk of non-compliance and associated administrative costs.

Making procedural compliance a condition of validity increases risk of invalidity due to minor errors. It would require high levels of technical compliance and, if the proposal is to invalidate tenure for all purposes (as opposed to invalidity insofar as the future act affects native title), would conflict with WA tenure and registration systems (including the Torrens system of land registration) and may have broad-reaching constitutional implications. This would be a disproportionate response to what might be the result of human error.

There is also a risk that third parties (ie non-native title parties) could challenge the validity of future acts on procedural grounds to gain a commercial advantage, leading to further litigation and resourcing burdens across the sector.

Question 14 and 15 – Replacing Subdivisions G-N with an Impact-Based Model (Including Exclusions)

This proposed reform is strongly opposed by the WA Government as the ‘impact-based’ model is legally uncertain, administratively complex, and fundamentally inconsistent with State legislation, policy and/or processes. In the absence of an objective means of identifying impact, the categorisation of future acts is likely to be subject to legal challenge, including potentially under the Administration Decisions (Judicial Review) Act 1977 (Cth). Transitional provisions would also be required to cater for a new set of acts, which will further complicate the system rather than simplifying it.

Further work would be needed to define what a statutory right to be consulted would involve, which may itself lead to further litigation.[1] Moreover, a binary approach to the impact of future acts on native title rights and interests is difficult to reconcile with the intricacies of WA's regulatory environment and will increase litigation, delay, and cost, as well as undermining the principle of equality by creating greater rights for native title holders than exist for freeholders under State laws.

There is also a risk that, combined with the proposal for the NNTT to hear and determine challenges to how a future act is categorised, the proposed reform will have the effect of replicating some of the practical difficulties associated with the Expedited Procedure. As this would apply to a broader range of acts which a State or Territory Government seeks to notify as a 'Category A' act, there is a risk that such notices will be regularly challenged as a means of accessing a more robust set of procedural rights, which will fall to the NNTT to determine (meaning its workload, and that of PBCs and other parties, will shift from Expedited Procedure objections to 'low impact procedure' inquiries, but not diminish overall).

The exclusions outlined in Question 15 are supported to the extent that Question 14 is progressed despite opposition from the WA Government. These exclusions are essential to facilitate future acts relating to State activities related to infrastructure, lease renewals, and emergency services. A comprehensive review of State legislation would be needed to identify further necessary exclusions, but is not possible within the timeframe for submissions.

Question 16 – 'Beyond Act' Impacts

This proposed reform is strongly opposed by the WA Government as it cuts across existing State and Commonwealth legislation relating to Aboriginal cultural heritage and environmental regulation (including in relation to 'social surrounds'). Defining and assessing impacts beyond the immediate disturbance, footprint or boundary of future acts, in most cases, would require extensive investigation, which would themselves be future acts. This difficulty is compounded by taking into account cultural impacts. The reform introduces unacceptable uncertainty, creates litigation risk in respect of the WA Government's regulatory role, and would be fundamentally unworkable.

Question 17 – Legislative Acts and Planning Activities

The WA Government does not support applying the impact-based model to legislative acts, which have broad application and differential effects. The application of procedural rights under the NTA would be practically unworkable and is highly likely to fetter unconstitutionally the WA Parliament's legislative powers.

Question 17 also identifies planning activities under State legislation such as water management as possible future acts that should attract procedural rights. This is strongly opposed as it lacks an understanding of WA's regulatory environment (noting in particular, that water allocation plans under the Rights in Water and Irrigation Act 1914 do not grant or directly permit water licences). At worst, the reform is fundamentally inconsistent with consultation principles under land use planning legislation.

Questions 18 and 19 – Test for National Native Title Tribunal Determinations and Criteria for Conditions

The WA Government expresses cautious support for these reforms, with the following qualifications. Firstly, on Question 18, the WA Government's support for the reform is conditional on the introduction of a multi-factorial test that includes consideration of existing statutory criteria (including the economic significance of the act and public interest in the doing of the act), whether the native title party's consent was unreasonably withheld, and whether the future act would present a real risk of substantial and irreparable harm.

In relation to Question 19, conditions placed on the doing of future acts must be consistent with State legislation, policy and practice. Conditions should also be practical, culturally appropriate, and not impact the viability of projects to which the future acts relate. Restrictions on trade or investment (e.g. domestic-only sales) should be avoided, if not expressly prohibited.

Question 21 – Non Claimant Applications

The WA Government does not express a view on this proposed reform as it does not utilise non-claimant applications (which are not generally used in WA).

Question 22 – Consequences of Invalidity

The WA Government agrees that consequences for non-compliance with the procedural obligations of the NTA should be clarified. This will provide greater certainty to government, industry and PBCs on the implications of invalid acts.

This proposed reform must be carefully considered and calibrated to reflect the complex intersections with State legislation outlined throughout this submission. In particular, any reform must avoid a disproportionate response to invalidity that may ultimately be the result of human error. The constitutional impacts of this proposal must also be considered (ie. confirming that the Commonwealth has the power to invalidate acts for all purposes), as well as other commercial and litigation risks it may precipitate.

Questions 24 and 25 – Future Act Payments

The WA Government strongly opposes these proposed reforms. It sees no principled basis for a Future Act Payment unless it is directly referable (and set off from) compensation for the impact of the future act on native title rights and interests. Even if these conditions were satisfied, the proposed reform is apt to create confusion given the varied role the WA Government plays in the Future Acts Regime – for example, would the WA Government be responsible for making or overseeing a Future Act Payment associated with granting land tenure to a third-party proponent?

The WA Government observes that calculating a Future Act Payment on the basis of the bifurcated approach set out in the Timber Creek decision[2] prior to the act being done (and cultural loss having been suffered) will be challenging, if not impossible. Careful consideration will need to be given to the basis on which a Future Act Payment is calculated, to avoid exceeding the entitlement to compensation.

4.3 Reforms to Compensation and Payments

The Discussion Paper outlines a suite of reforms aimed at ensuring native title parties receive commensurate and timely compensation for effects on native title rights and interests caused by future acts (Proposals 12 and 13; Question 26 – noting commentary above in relation to Questions 24 and 25). The WA Government acknowledges the importance of ensuring that native title holders are fairly compensated for the impact of future acts on their native title rights and interests. However, the legal, financial, and administrative implications of the ALRC's proposed reforms cause serious concern:

Proposal 12 – Clarifying Compensation in ILUAs

This proposal requires further investigation. The proposed amendment to make compensation "full and final" only where explicitly stated and paid in full could create residual liabilities for the State, particularly where third-party proponents are involved and the State is not a party to the ILUA. This would undermine the certainty that ILUAs are intended to provide and may necessitate broader amendments to the compensation framework under the NTA, given that compensation for future acts is currently predicated on the compensation entitlement arising from the Subdivision that validates the particular future act, when typically no other Subdivision would apply to give rise to a compensation entitlement.

Proposal 13 – Statutory Compensation for Invalid Future Acts

This proposal requires further, careful investigation, as it is likely to have a significant impact in WA (including for the WA Government), notwithstanding that the number of invalid future acts in the State is currently unknown (and would require significant investigation to determine). Further work is needed to determine how a statutory right to compensation would interact with existing remedies under the general law.

While the WA Government acknowledges that a clear statutory basis for compensation for invalid future acts could be useful, it is generally understood that compensation for interference with native title arising from invalid acts currently exists outside the NTA. Any reform must be carefully considered to avoid unintended legal and financial consequences.

Question 26 – Short Form Agreements

The WA Government supports further investigation of this proposed reform, conditional upon the form of agreement and class of acts being clear and subject to standing instructions. The reform may not be viable or worthwhile progressing if the circumstances covered by Short Form Agreements are too narrow.

The WA Government does not agree (as set out in the Discussion Paper) that the only method of agreeing compensation is via an ILUA. Ancillary agreements pursuant to section 31 of the NTA regularly provide for compensation and compensation can be agreed by way of a Deed.

4.4 Native Title Management Plans

The WA Government strongly opposes the reform proposal outlined in Question 6 of the Discussion Paper to amend the NTA to enable PBCs to develop and register NTMPs as an alternative statutory procedure for validating future acts.

The WA Government acknowledges the intent behind the reform proposal in empowering native title holders to signal the interests, proposals, opinions and wishes of Traditional Owners in relation to land management. However, the NTMP proposal presents significant legal, administrative, and strategic challenges that would undermine the integrity of the existing agreement-making system, the State's land use management frameworks, and create substantial uncertainty for government, industry, and native title parties alike.

The WA Government considers the NTMP proposal to be legally and practically unworkable and recommends that reform efforts focus on strengthening existing mechanisms (such as ILUAs) that support negotiated, transparent, and coordinated outcomes. The WA Government's strong opposition is based on the following:

- Fragmentation and Complexity for Proponents: NTMPs would create a patchwork of procedural requirements across the State, increasing complexity and compliance burdens for proponents, especially those undertaking cross-regional or large-scale projects that cover multiple determination areas (and therefore may be subject to more than one NTMP);
- Barriers to Strategic Development and Investment: The lack of a consistent framework would deter investment and hinder the delivery of major infrastructure projects, including those critical to Australia's energy transition and decarbonisation goals;
- Lack of State Involvement: NTMPs would be developed without formal State involvement, raising risks of legal and administrative conflict with State legislation and processes. The WA Government notes the heavy reliance in the Discussion Paper on the Tjiwarl Palyakuwa ILUA, but stresses that it is not an appropriate analogy for the NTMP concept, as it was the outcome of an agreement between the relevant PBC and the WA Government;
- Undermining of Strategic Land Use Planning: NTMPs could include exclusion zones that effectively prohibit development, conflicting with the State's role in land use planning and constraining public infrastructure and housing delivery, including in remote Aboriginal communities whose populations can often be a blend of native title holders and other Aboriginal residents;
- Departure from Agreement-Making Principles: The NTMP model bypasses collaborative negotiation and agreement-making, undermining the principles of mutual consent and shared decision-making central to the native title system. The WA Government notes that the ILUA provisions already allow for agreement to be reached about the doing, or the doing subject to conditions, of particular future acts or classes of future acts;
- Capacity and Resourcing Limitations: The proposal assumes a level of capability within PBCs that does not currently exist. Without significant investment, NTMPs would exacerbate existing challenges and increase the risk of procedural invalidity.

4.5 Reforms to Resourcing and Costs

The Discussion Paper outlines several reforms to support the capacity and capability of PBCs (Proposals 14, 15 and 17). While some of these proposals (such as operational funding for PBCs and enhanced support from NTRBs/SPs) may offer benefits and warrant cautious support, others raise significant concerns for the WA Government. In particular, the proposed cost recovery mechanisms risk imposing unsustainable financial and administrative burdens on the State and industry, and may encourage transactional rather than collaborative approaches to agreement-making. Overall, the WA Government considers that these reforms require further investigation to ensure they are workable, equitable, and aligned with broader policy objectives.

Proposal 14 – Perpetual Capital Fund for PBCs

The WA Government expresses cautious support for this proposal, recognising the importance of addressing the operational funding gap for PBCs. This support is contingent on greater clarity around the proposed administrative arrangements and governance of the fund.

Proposal 15 – NTRB/SP Support for PBCs

The WA Government supports this proposal, as it has the potential to improve the responsiveness and capacity of PBCs in future act negotiations and streamline administrative processes, but notes this will require commensurate funding for NTRBs/SPs to be practically effective.

Proposal 17 – Strengthen Cost Recovery

The WA Government does not support this proposal in its current form. In particular, it is concerned about the sustainability of the proposed cost recovery model, the risk of transactional approaches to future act administration, and the potential financial burden on government and industry. The proposal is not responsive to sector specific challenges (e.g. low capital industries) and would likely require the WA Government to consider mechanisms to pass on costs in full to third party proponents.

5.0 Proposed Alternative Reforms

The WA Government suggests the following alternative reforms are considered in the event that the reforms set out in the Discussion Paper are not progressed. This section is set out in the same format as the Discussion Paper, with alternative reforms posed as Proposals and Questions.

5.1 Proposal – Increased support for PBCs

The WA Government supports a comprehensive reform agenda that empowers PBCs to fulfil their statutory responsibilities under the NTA, while enabling them to pursue broader community, cultural, and economic aspirations. Central to this is the need for structural and governance reforms that make it easier for PBCs to establish and operate subsidiary or separate corporate vehicles. These vehicles would allow PBCs to compartmentalise their statutory functions, commercial enterprises, and service delivery roles. This will improve governance and the management of organisational risks by ensuring that PBCs' core statutory responsibilities in responding to future act matters are not diluted by competing demands.

The WA Government also recommends clearer guidance on the statutory functions of PBCs and targeted investment in training and education for directors, staff, and advisors. These supports would help build enduring organisational capability and address intergenerational knowledge gaps, particularly in relation to future act matters. By strengthening internal capacity and reducing reliance on external consultants, PBCs would be better positioned to engage confidently in agreement-making, manage complex negotiations, and uphold the rights and interests of native title holders.

In this context, several reform proposals in the Discussion Paper (particularly those relating to centralised information on future acts) could serve as important enablers for a new stream of 'activity-based' operational funding. This funding stream, administered directly to PBCs by the Commonwealth Government, could be tailored to the volume and complexity of future act matters managed by each PBC and 'ringfenced' from other funding supporting broader PBC functions.

When combined with the structural and capability-building reforms outlined above and increased baseline funding from the Commonwealth Government, this approach would support PBCs in developing and retaining corporate knowledge and experience, particularly in relation to future acts. Collectively, these support measures could underpin a transformative change that empowers PBCs to proactively engage with the Future Acts Regime as part of broader 'Nation-building' efforts.

5.2 Proposal – Alternative Reforms to the Right to Negotiate

The WA Government acknowledges persistent challenges in the operation of the RTN provisions in WA, including inconsistent engagement between parties, ambiguity around the requirements for Negotiating in Good Faith (NIGF), limited resourcing of the NNTT, and insufficient support for PBCs. These issues collectively undermine the intent and effectiveness of the RTN framework and contribute to procedural inefficiencies and inequities in agreement-making.

The WA Government considers that extending statutory timeframes would not address these underlying issues. A significant proportion of Future Act Determination Applications lodged with the NNTT in WA are uncontested, often because parties have reached agreement but are unable to satisfy formal procedural requirements.

Instead, the WA Government proposes the following as practical reforms to the RTN:

- limitations on the number of times a future act matter can be referred back to negotiation after a successful NIGF challenge; and
- enhanced resourcing and capability of the NNTT to support timely and effective facilitation and arbitration.

Future Act Payments could also be incorporated into this reformed RTN process, provided the issues outlined above concerning their relationship to compensation are addressed.

This approach would be complemented by increased transparency in funding arrangements and targeted support for PBCs to participate meaningfully in negotiations. The WA Government considers that these reforms would improve the accessibility, fairness and efficiency of the RTN process in WA, and better reflect the realities of agreement-making in a post-determination landscape.

5.3 Proposal – Amend section 24LA (Low Impact Future Acts)

Over 90 percent of WA is Crown Land, much of which is subject to Native Title rights and interests. The WA Government regulates third-party access to this land, particularly for new industry development, under the Mining Act 1978, Petroleum and Geothermal Energy Resources Act 2006, and the Land Administration Act 1997 (LAA).

The Future Acts Regime presents significant challenges for the management of the Crown Land estate, especially in the early stages of project development. Section 24LA of the NTA allows for low impact future acts, such as feasibility studies, aerial and geological surveys, and other scoping activities. Many of these activities are permitted via licences under section 91 of the LAA, which provides for non-exclusive land access akin to a profit à prendre.

The issue arises because section 24LA stipulates that such acts cannot continue after a determination of native title. Given that most of WA has either determined or pending native title claims, this limitation means that even low-impact activities must be validated through an ILUA. As a result, proponents are drawn into substantive negotiations with PBCs at a very early stage (often before the project scope or benefits can be clearly articulated) leading to delays, increased costs and misaligned expectations, frustrating efforts to secure free, prior and informed consent.

To address these challenges, it is suggested that consideration be given to amending section 24LA or introducing a new subdivision (possibly after Subdiv E) to:

- Extend the validation of low impact future acts, such as aerial and geological surveys and feasibility studies, beyond the point of native title determination.
- Clarify and codify the scope of permissible low impact activities, ensuring they remain consistent with the protection of native title rights, while enabling responsible early-stage development.
- Introduce streamlined processes and cost guidance for preliminary engagement with Traditional Owners, reducing the burden on both proponents and PBCs.
- Support a staged engagement model, allowing proponents to build relationships and negotiate ILUAs once feasibility studies have clarified the development potential and benefits for Traditional Owners.

These amendments would maintain the integrity of native title while enabling more efficient and transparent land access for early-stage development across WA.

5.4 Proposal – Amend section 26D to Permit Secondary Mining Renewals

A problematic intersection that currently exists between State legislation and the Future Acts Regime is the secondary renewals of mining leases under the Mining Act 1978 and similar State legislation. The explanatory memoranda for the 1998 amendments, which introduced section 26D of the NTA, make clear that renewal of an earlier right to mine that is valid or which had gone through the RTN process would not have to go through that process again. As it is currently drafted, this position is potentially uncertain.

The WA Government suggests section 26D be amended to clarify the position and realign it to the original statutory intent expressed in the explanatory memoranda. This would provide greater clarity and certainty for existing mining operations.

5.5 Proposal – Alternative Reforms to the Expedited Procedure

The WA Government acknowledges concerns about the fairness and efficacy of the Expedited Procedure. While the Expedited Procedure facilitates efficient processing of low-impact tenement applications in WA, the WA Government recognises the potential impact of existing policies and practices on native title parties.

The WA Government considers its existing policy and practice in relation to the use of the expedited procedure is appropriate when considered in the context of the volume of exploratory titles granted in the State, as outlined above. Of the 5,661 objections lodged against the 9,774 tenements notified in the Expedited Procedure over the last five years, 3,547 were withdrawn, 389 dismissed and only 71 objections were upheld (meaning the NNTT determined that the Expedited Procedure did not apply to the act).

The WA Government understands the practical challenges native title holders face in responding to Expedited Procedure notices, including providing sufficient evidence to sustain an objection. It also recognises the associated difficulties with cultural restrictions on disclosing culturally sensitive information about sites and the difficulty of gathering such evidence. However, repeal of the Expedited Procedure would at best increase the compliance burden on all parties (and in particular, native title parties) and at worst create a significant bottleneck of exploration titles in WA.

Although the Expedited Procedure is an inquiry process, in practice it is utilised as a de facto RTN, facilitated by the NNTT's case management processes. The WA Government considers this to be the main driver of process costs associated with the Expedited Procedure, noting that section 60AB does not (and should not) apply to Expedited Procedure objections. In recognition of this, the WA Government recommends that the ALRC consider reforms that would:

(a) Align the Expedited Procedure with the RTN by requiring the NNTT to determine an objection within six months of the closing date for objections and report to the Commonwealth Minister if that timeframe cannot be achieved;

(b) Address funding, training and capability gaps for PBCs to decrease any perceived or actual pressure to lodge an objection due to timeframes and/or available information to assess individual applications (including what is required to demonstrate that the Expedited Procedure should not apply); and

(c) Provide greater guidance on the evidentiary standards required to disapply the criteria in s 237 of the NTA.

The WA Government introduced reforms to its application of the Expedited Procedure in 2022, which implemented a 'risk based' assessment process characterised by early intervention and negotiation mechanisms to appropriately identify higher risk areas, resulting in notifying certain matters identified directly to the RTN process. Based on this experience, the WA Government's view is that better outcomes would be achieved if native title parties were adequately supported to undertake their own risk assessment of future acts notified in the Expedited Procedure.

5.6 Proposal – Fully Electronic Notifications

The WA Government acknowledges that the complexity of the Future Acts Regime can often run counter to the NTA's core objectives (particularly the goals of fostering transparent and informed consultation with native title parties and providing certainty to land users). Determining whether an activity constitutes a future act, and under which provision it should be notified, can be administratively burdensome and legally ambiguous. This complexity can disincentivise early engagement and lead to procedural inefficiencies.

The WA Government is committed to improving consultation with Traditional Owners on matters affecting their country. However, significant resources are often expended by government agencies, proponents, and native title holders to comply with or respond to notification requirements—efforts that may not be proportionate to the actual impact of the future act on native title rights and interests.

Key challenges include:

- Determining whether an activity is a future act requiring notification, especially when part of a larger, staged project.
- Balancing early engagement with native title holders and claimants (which supports site avoidance and good practice) against formal notification requirements under the NTA.
- Navigating cost recovery provisions triggered by consultation that may involve future acts.
- Ambiguity that can lead to a strict compliance approach, discouraging early, informal consultation.

In some cases, these issues have led proponents and government agencies to delay engagement with PBCs until a formal decision to proceed is made, which is arguably consistent with the NTA but may be contrary to good practices in stakeholder engagement.

To address these challenges, the WA Government proposes the following reforms:

1. Electronic Notifications as Default

   Amend the NTA and the Native Title (Notices) Determination 2024 to make electronic notifications the default and legally valid method for future act notices, assuming appropriate safeguards are in place to address digital access and literacy needs. This would:

   - Reduce administrative burden.
   - Improve timeliness and accessibility.
   - Strengthen compliance and transparency.

2. Standardised Notice Formats

   Introduce prescribed templates and formats for future act notices to promote clarity, consistency, and reduce the risk of legal challenge.

3. Clearer Guidance on Notification Triggers and Timing

   Develop comprehensive guidance to help stakeholders determine:

    - When an activity constitutes a future act.
    - The appropriate timing and method of notification.
    - How to engage meaningfully with Traditional Owners without prematurely triggering cost recovery provisions.

These reforms would support more equitable and efficient engagement, and ensure that procedural requirements are proportionate to the impact on native title rights and interests.

5.7 Question – Additional Agreement-Making Vehicles

The WA Government considers that reforms can be made to the Future Acts Regime to retain the flexibility and adaptability of ILUAs, whilst achieving greater alignment with the intent of the NTA and the principle of free, prior and informed consent.[3]

One such reform is to introduce a more targeted ‘right to negotiate’ process into the existing validation provisions of the NTA and permitting validation by a simple contractual arrangement between the parties. This could apply to certain types of projects or activities (for example, low-impact future acts relating to preliminary land access). To the extent that validation through one of these provisions creates a compensation liability, consideration could also be given to incorporating a limited arbitration process to provide an appropriate compensation range to inform those negotiations (discussed below).

Notwithstanding the WA Government’s support for ILUAs to remain as the principal tool for future act agreement-making, there is a need for additional vehicles to be considered. These vehicles should retain the general procedural guidance for ILUAs (for example sections 24B-D), but could provide additional flexibility through:

- Modified processes for certain categories of future acts (for example, facilities for services to the public and low impact activities) that are proportionate to the impact of those acts on native title rights and interests;
- Provisions that enable the WA Government to undertake future acts where the PBC is the proponent, without the need to register an ILUA (or a simplified ILUA process) to ensure the State is not responsible for a compensation liability;
- Set costs and timeframes; and
- Modified native title decision-making processes.

5.8 Question – Introducing an Independent Compensation and Arbitration Process

The WA Government supports the introduction of a mechanism for independent decision-making to guide fair and reasonable compensation outcomes in native title negotiations. This reform would allow parties (by mutual agreement or election) to refer compensation matters to an independent body or panel for non-binding guidance, helping to resolve disputes and promote equitable outcomes.

[3] Conceived as the ‘right to a robust process’: see Blackhawk J in Kebaowek First Nation v Canadian Nuclear Laboratories [2025] FC 319.

Currently, the process for determining compensation under the NTA is complex, resource-intensive, and often lacks clarity, particularly in negotiations involving non-extinguishing acts or legacy tenures. While the High Court's decision in Timber Creek remains the only judicial precedent on compensation valuation, it does not provide a scalable framework for the wide variety of compensation scenarios encountered in practice.

To address this, the WA Government proposes that an Independent Compensation Advisory Panel is established as a statutory or administrative body empowered to provide non-binding, expert guidance on compensation, taking into account cultural, economic, and legal factors relevant to native title impacts. This should incorporate:

- A Voluntary Referral Mechanism: Parties to a negotiation (e.g. governments, proponents, and PBCs) could elect to refer compensation matters to the panel, either jointly or individually, to support informed and fair agreement-making.
- Standardised Principles and Methodologies: The panel would apply transparent and consistent principles, informed by judicial precedent and stakeholder input, to promote predictability and reduce disputes.
- Safeguards for Cultural Sensitivity and Consent: The process would respect Traditional Owner decision-making and ensure that any guidance provided does not override the need for free, prior, and informed consent.

This reform would support more efficient and equitable compensation negotiations, reduce reliance on costly litigation, and enhance confidence in the current agreement-making processes under the NTA.

5.9 Question – Recognising Pass Through Provisions

The current construction of the Future Acts Regime places the liability and responsibility for NTA compliance for a significant proportion of future acts undertaken in WA, with the WA Government by default. This includes future acts where the WA Government is undertaking the future act on behalf of a third-party proponent (for example granting land tenure under State legislation).

The WA Government has made the decision to pass on the liability for certain acts to the beneficiaries of such acts via State legislation (see for example section 125A of the Mining Act 1978 and section 24A of the Petroleum and Geothermal Energy Resources Act 1967). The validity of section 125A is currently the subject of legal challenge in the Federal Court of Australia.

In other contexts where grants of interests in land are discretionary, the WA Government will seek evidence from the proponent that they have entered into an ILUA or otherwise complied with the Future Acts Regime. In some cases, the WA Government will require the proponent to confirm that they have indemnified the State against any native title liabilities associated with the future act. This process is cumbersome, complex, uncertain and not necessarily conducive to agreement making and partnerships between proponents and native title holders (and claimants).

In the interests of providing greater certainty, the WA Government suggests that the ALRC consider amendments to the NTA that confirm, codify and/or expand the ability of Commonwealth, State and Territory Governments to pass on native title liabilities for future acts to third parties, subject to the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 (Cth). This would encourage greater accountability for proponents to manage the impact of their projects on native title rights and interests as well as any associated liabilities.

5.10 Question – Additional Cost Recovery Guidance

The WA Government considers that the operation of section 60AB of the NTA lacks essential guardrails. There are currently no clear standards, criteria, or oversight mechanisms to guide how cost recovery should be applied by PBCs. This has led to inconsistent practices, uncertainty for proponents, and inefficiencies that undermine the sustainability of PBCs and the integrity of the Future Acts Regime.

These issues are particularly pronounced given the WA Government's dual role as a proponent responsible for meeting costs under section 60AB, and a facilitator of future acts that benefit third parties, such as issuing pastoral permits under Subdiv G. In many cases, the Government bears the financial burden for acts initiated on behalf of third-party proponents, despite not being the direct beneficiary of the activity.

To address these challenges, the WA Government proposes the following reforms:

- Introduce Guidelines for Cost Recovery: Amend the NTA to establish a regulation-making power that enables the development of clear guidelines for:
    - What types of activities justify cost recovery; and
    - How fees should be calculated to ensure they are reasonable and proportionate to the complexity, impact, and nature of the Future Act and the services provided.
- Simplify Cost Recovery Processes: Create a streamlined and transparent framework for cost recovery under section 60AB, reducing administrative burden and improving certainty for all parties.
- Independent Oversight of Fee Disputes: Transfer the function of assessing fee disputes from the Registrar of Indigenous Corporations to the NNTT, which has the expertise and authority to evaluate what fees are reasonable and proportionate in the context of future act negotiations.
- Mechanism to Transfer Cost Responsibility to Third Parties: Establish a statutory mechanism that allows governments to pass on cost recovery obligations to third-party proponents where the Future Act is initiated for their benefit. This mechanism should:
    - Be transparent and legally enforceable;
    - Include safeguards to ensure proponents are aware of and agree to the cost obligations; and
    - Be supported by administrative processes that facilitate direct payment to PBCs.
- Preserve Equity in the Expedited Procedure: The WA Government does not support extending section 60AB to the Expedited Procedure, as it would increase costs, discourage early-stage exploration, and would be inappropriate for what is essentially an arbitral process. Instead, operational funding support for PBCs should be prioritised.

These reforms would introduce much-needed guardrails, ensuring that cost recovery under section 60AB is fair, proportionate, and appropriately allocated, while supporting meaningful engagement with native title holders (and claimants) and efficient administration of the Future Acts Regime.

6.0 Interaction with Aboriginal Cultural Heritage Processes

The protection of Aboriginal cultural heritage in Australia operates through a complex framework involving both Commonwealth and State legislation, which intersects with the NTA. In WA, the Aboriginal Heritage Act 1972 (AHA) is the primary instrument for managing Aboriginal heritage, while at the federal level, the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Heritage Protection Act 1984 (Cth) provides a mechanism of last resort where State protections are inadequate.

These frameworks overlap with the Future Acts Regime, which governs activities that may affect native title rights and interests, including rights in relation to the protection of culturally significant sites. However, the lack of integration between these systems often results in procedural duplication, gaps in protection, and inconsistent engagement with Traditional Owners.

Key intersections between the NTA and the AHA include:

- Distinct but Concurrent Legal Frameworks: The NTA and the AHA operate independently, each with its own objectives and processes. While the NTA focuses on protecting native title rights in relation to land use and development, the AHA is concerned with the identification and protection of Aboriginal cultural heritage. Activities may require compliance with both regimes.
- Different Procedural Rights and Approaches: The NTA provides procedural rights such as notification, consultation, and in some cases, negotiation with native title holders. The AHA, by contrast, provides a statutory process for assessing and approving impacts on heritage sites, with advisory input from the Aboriginal Cultural Heritage Committee. The level and form of engagement with Traditional Owners may differ between the two frameworks.
- Use of Agreements: In practice, proponents often negotiate heritage agreements with PBCs as part of broader land access or ILUA processes. While these agreements can help align native title and heritage considerations, they are not formally required under the AHA.
- Role of PBCs and Individual Knowledge Holders: AHA processes are not exclusive to native title holders and has regard to other Aboriginal people who have knowledge and rights in relation to Aboriginal sites, although the role of native title parties is recognised via the right of review to the State Administrative Tribunal.
- Administrative and Resource Considerations: Navigating both systems can involve significant administrative effort for proponents, PBCs, and government agencies. The need to comply with multiple legislative requirements may contribute to complexity, particularly in high-volume sectors such as mining and infrastructure.

- Ongoing Review and Reform: The WA Government, in collaboration with the NNTT, is currently reviewing the interaction between the NTA and AHA to explore opportunities for improved coordination, efficiency, and cultural heritage outcomes.

The WA Government recognises the importance of both native title and cultural heritage frameworks in protecting the rights and interests of Aboriginal people. It acknowledges that while current legislation provides avenues for consultation and review, the lack of integration and differentiation in capacity across PBCs can lead to inconsistent outcomes. The WA Government supports reforms that improve clarity, coordination, and procedural fairness across systems, while ensuring that engagement with Traditional Owners is inclusive, culturally appropriate, and reflective of both collective and individual knowledge.

The WA Government suggests that improvements to the interface between the Future Acts Regime and legislation in relation to Aboriginal cultural heritage (as well as reforms to both State and Commonwealth legislation) is essential to achieving sustainable development and respectful heritage management.

7.0 Conclusions

The WA Government urges the ALRC and the Commonwealth Government to adopt a balanced reform approach that minimises disruption and reflects the operational realities of WA’s post-determination landscape. Reforms must be supported by transitional arrangements, capacity-building investments, and implementation pathways that allow adequate consultation with States and Territories. The WA Government remains committed to constructive engagement with the reform process and ensuring that any changes to the Future Acts Regime are fair, balanced and promote agreement-making.

APPENDIX 1 – WA GOVERNMENT POSITION ON ALRC QUESTIONS AND PROPOSALS

This document sets out the WA Government's position and a brief analysis in relation to each Question and Proposal set out in the ALRC's Issues Paper and Discussion Paper.

	Question or Proposal (from Paper)	WA Government position	Analysis
Proposal 1 – Expanded Use of Standing Instructions	Amend the NTA and PBC Regulations to allow PBCs to use standing instructions from common law holders to enter into more types of agreements (e.g. for exploration or low-impact acts), reducing the need for repeated authorisation processes	Support.	If implemented, the proposal has the potential to streamline agreement-making by reducing repeated authorisation processes, improving efficiency for low-impact future acts. It addresses process inefficiencies and costs associated with PBC-led future act proposals. Care must be taken to ensure standing instructions are legally robust and clearly scoped, to avoid misuse or duplication of authorisation processes. A monitoring mechanism should be considered to track implementation across PBCs and agreement types.
Proposal 2 – PBC Access to Agreements	Ensure PBCs have automatic access to all registered agreements affecting their determination area. Upon a native title determination, the Native Title Registrar must identify and provide relevant agreements to the PBC.	Support	If implemented, the proposal has the potential to enhance transparency and empower PBCs by backing up and supporting their corporate memory and record-keeping. A key consideration for this proposal should be implementing clear protocols for timely and secure transfer of agreements; clarity in responsibilities for and data management; as well as ensuring the systems maintained by the NNTT are compatible and equipped to manage access.

Proposal 3 – Automatic Removal of Expired ILUAs	Amend the Act so that ILUAs are automatically removed from the Native Title Register when: the relevant interest has expired or been surrendered; the agreement has expired or been terminated; or the agreement otherwise ends.	Support.	If implemented, will improve the accuracy of the ILUA Register, as well as improving transparency and clarity in relation to future act consents. A key consideration for this proposal should be providing sufficient time and support for the NNTT to assess the administrative burden and practical implementation process (including back capture) as well as providing adequate resources for ongoing compliance. A minor consideration is the extent to which this will require detailed input from the WA Government, in which case sufficient time and support should be extended to relevant WA agencies in providing information to assist implementation.
Proposal 4 – Periodic Audit of ILUAs	Require the Native Title Registrar to periodically audit the ILUA Register to identify and remove expired or obsolete agreements, improving accuracy and transparency.	Support.	The WA Government supports this proposal as it has the potential to improve transparency and compliance, noting it may have an administrative impact for the WA Government if the onus is on proponent agencies to respond to the audits of the Register.
Proposal 5 – Binding Dispute Resolution by the NNTT	Allow parties to existing agreements to seek a binding determination from the NNTT to resolve disputes, offering a lower-cost alternative to litigation.	Neutral – Further investigation required.	The impact of this reform requires further investigation. It should also be noted that, taken together, the proposals advanced and reforms explored in the Discussion Paper would require a substantial uplift in the NNTT's resourcing and capability.

Proposal 6 – Reformed Right to Negotiate Process	Revise the right to negotiate process to: Require early information sharing; Allow native title parties to object within 6 months; If native title parties do not object, require a minimum period of 18 months for negotiation, before a determination can be sought from the NNTT; Empower the NNTT to determine if a future act can proceed (if a native title party objects) and under what conditions; Introduce a 5-year moratorium if the NNTT decides the act cannot be done.	Oppose.	The WA Government does not support extending the negotiation period to 18 months or the proposed moratorium, and expresses concern about the broader reform proposal. In the context of the existing RTN, there is no demonstrated need to extend the minimum period for negotiations. The proposal risks significant delays for the mining and exploration sector, particularly in circumstances where the inability to reach agreement is unconnected to the impact of the future act on native title rights and interests, or where is a determination is required because parties have been unable to meet the formal requirements of a section 31 agreement. The proposal to expand the scope of the RTN, either through the impact-based future act provisions or the NTMP concept, would also create a substantial impact on other tenure grants, including for critical infrastructure and regional service delivery in WA, including essential services to remote Aboriginal communities, and could deter investment in projects of national and State significance that, if negotiated successfully, could provide substantial benefits to native title holders.

			Alongside the extended negotiation period, the proposed moratorium would in practice create an effective veto, and is likely to be in conflict with WA legislation (e.g. Mining Act priority rights) and may lead to legal challenges from proponents who had a legitimate expectation that their applications would proceed, for example, in the event of forfeiture.
Proposal 7 – Issue Referral to the NNTT	Enable parties to jointly refer specific issues to the NNTT for binding determination during negotiations, helping resolve deadlocks and promote agreement-making.	Neutral – Further investigation required.	This proposal requires further investigation and extensive consultation with the WA Government to explore the details. This should include assessing how binding determinations during negotiations could affect the operation of State legislation and processes, as well as workload impacts for key WA Government agencies.
Proposal 8 – Remove Ban on Royalty-Based Conditions	Repeal section 38(2) of the NTA to allow the NNTT to impose conditions on future acts that include payments based on royalties, profits, or income.	Oppose.	This proposal will likely lead to overcompensation, require complex valuation and commercial expertise that does not currently reside within the NNTT, create commercial uncertainty and expose the State to significant financial risk, especially when combined with the impact-based future act provisions and the NTMP proposal. It would also leave open the possibility that commercially unviable conditions could be imposed on future acts that are inherently unprofitable, including public infrastructure.

Proposal 9 – Repeal the Expedited Procedure	Abolish the expedited procedure (section 32 NTA), replacing it with: Exploration ILUAs; Native Title Management Plans; or Impact-based statutory procedures.	Oppose.	The repeal of the Expedited Procedure is strongly opposed, as it would have a significant impact on the mining and exploration sector, creating significant uncertainty, delay and additional costs that will likely hinder new and ongoing investment in exploration and restrict the pipeline of new mining projects. The proposal would also create significant administrative and resource burdens for PBCs, considering the volume of exploration applications granted annually in WA. While the Discussion Paper also proposes reforms to PBC resourcing, this would likely overwhelm PBCs at their current capacity levels and would require substantial additional resourcing and time to ‘scale up.’ The existing RTN is an overly cumbersome process, especially when considering the volume of exploration titles granted in the WA context. Repealing the Expedited Procedure would place unworkable administrative burdens on all parties and introduce significant delays and costs that would make a significant number of exploration projects unviable and overwhelm the capacity of PBCs and other native title parties.

Proposal 10 – Procedural Compliance as a Condition of Validity	Make compliance with procedural requirements (e.g. notice, consultation) a condition for the validity of future acts, ensuring enforceability and accountability.	Oppose (pending further detail).	This proposal, combined with the proposed introduction of statutory remedies for invalid acts, would require significant resourcing to ensure high levels of technical compliance. Other suggested reforms, including an ‘impact-based’ assessment of future acts, have the potential create additional ambiguity and uncertainty, increasing the risk of non-compliance and associated administrative costs. Making procedural compliance a condition of validity increases risk of invalidity due to minor errors. It would require high levels of technical compliance and, if the proposal is to invalidate tenure for all purposes, would conflict with WA tenure and registration systems (including the Torrens system) and may have broad-reaching constitutional implications.
Proposal 11 – Central Register of Future Act Notices	Require all future act notices to be lodged with the NNTT, which would maintain a public register to improve transparency, data collection, and oversight.	Support.	This proposal is aligned with work it is currently undertaking to develop contemporary, whole of government policy settings for future acts. This approach includes centralised reporting and data management on future acts undertaken by the WA Government. Consideration should be given to ensuring that any centralised register is required to capture information spatially, even if this is not the primary mechanism.

Proposal 12 – Clarify Compensation in ILUAs	Amend sections 24EB and 24EBA so that compensation under an agreement is only considered full and final if: the agreement explicitly states so; and the agreed amounts are actually paid.	Neutral – Further investigation required.	This proposal requires further investigation. The proposed amendment to make compensation “full and final” only where explicitly stated and paid in full could create residual liabilities for the State, particularly where third-party proponents are involved and the State is not a party to the ILUA. This would undermine the certainty that ILUAs are intended to provide and may necessitate broader amendments to the compensation framework under the NTA.
Proposal 13 – Compensation for Invalid Future Acts	Introduce a statutory right to compensation for invalid future acts, removing the need to rely on complex and uncertain common law remedies like trespass.	Neutral – Further investigation required.	This proposal requires careful investigation, as it is likely to have a significant impact in WA. Further work is needed to determine how a statutory right to compensation would interact with existing remedies. While a clear statutory basis for compensation for invalid future acts could be useful, any reform must be carefully considered to avoid unintended legal and financial consequences.
Proposal 14 – Perpetual Capital Fund for PBCs	Establish a perpetual capital fund, overseen by the Future Fund Board, to provide core operational funding to PBCs, ensuring long-term financial sustainability.	Support (pending further detail).	The WA Government recognises the importance of addressing the operational funding gap for PBCs, however its support for this proposal is contingent on clarity around the proposed administrative arrangements and governance of the fund.

Proposal 15 – NTRB/SP Support for PBCs	Allow Native Title Representative Bodies and Service Providers to use part of their funding to support PBCs in responding to future act notices.	Support.	The WA Government supports this proposal, noting its potential to improve the responsiveness and capacity of PBCs in future act negotiations and streamline administrative processes, but notes this will require commensurate funding for NTRBs/SPs to be practically effective.
Proposal 16 – Fund the NNTT	Provide adequate funding to the NNTT to: Fulfil its expanded functions under the proposed reforms, Offer more facilitation and mediation services.	Support.	This reform, if implemented comprehensively, will enhance the NNTT's ability to manage their existing responsibilities. However, the WA Government expresses concern that the other proposals advanced and reforms explored in the Discussion Paper will require a substantial uplift in, and considerable expansion of, the NNTT's resourcing and capability to avoid uncertainty and delay. Workload implications must be considered in detail and sufficient investment in resourcing made, monitored and adjusted as needed should any of the proposals in the Discussion Paper be implemented.
Proposal 17 – Strengthen Cost Recovery	Amend section 60AB to: Allow registered claimants to charge fees, Set a minimum scale of costs, Prohibit caps below this scale, Impose a duty to pay, Clarify that government parties can pass costs to proponents.	Oppose.	The WA Government is concerned about the sustainability of the proposed cost recovery model, the risk of transactional approaches to future act administration, and the potential financial burden on government and industry.

			The proposed model is not responsive to sector specific challenges (e.g. low capital industries) and would likely require the WA Government to consider mechanisms to comprehensively pass on costs in full to third party proponents.
Proposal 18 – First Nations Advisory Group	Establish a resourced First Nations advisory group to guide the implementation of reforms, ensuring alignment with international human rights standards and Indigenous self-determination.	Neutral – Further investigation required.	This proposal requires further investigation for the WA Government to indicate a position, which may ultimately depend on matters such as the governance and membership of the group.
*Issues Paper Question 1 – Important issues for reform	What are the most important issues to consider for reform in the Future Acts Regime?	Not applicable.	Important issues for reform are outlined in Section 5 of the WA Government's submission.
*Issues Paper Question 2 – Important issues not identified in Issues Paper	Are there any important issues with how the Future Acts Regime currently operates that are not identified in the Issues Paper?	Not applicable.	Important issues for reform are outlined in Section 5 of the WA Government's submission.
*Issues Paper Question 3 – Aspects of the Future Acts Regime that work well	Are there any aspects of the Future Acts Regime that work well?	Not applicable.	Functional areas of the regime are outlined throughout the WA Government's submission (noting the complex operating environment makes them difficult to isolate).

Issues Paper Question 4 – Ideas for reform	Do you have any ideas for how to reform the Future Acts Regime?	Not applicable.	Suggested reforms are outlined in Section 5 of the WA Government’s submission.
Issues Paper Question 5 – What would an ideal Future Acts Regime look like?	What would an ideal Future Acts Regime look like?	Not applicable.	Legally robust, procedurally clear, and practically workable, supporting both the protection of native title rights and the efficient administration of land and resource development. It would balance all of the following principles well: 1. Empower PBCs through sustainable operational funding, clear statutory guidance, and targeted capacity-building to enable meaningful participation in agreement-making. 2. Support agreement-making as the preferred pathway, with streamlined processes, standardised documentation, and improved access to precedent agreements to promote fairness and consistency. 3. Ensure proportionality and clarity in procedural requirements, with reforms that reduce unnecessary administrative burden and align obligations with the actual impact of proposed acts. 4. Incorporate flexible and scalable mechanisms for determining compensation, including access to independent, non-binding guidance where agreed by the parties.

			5. Enable early and informed engagement through default electronic notifications, standardised notice formats, and clear guidance on when and how consultation should occur. 6. Respect jurisdictional diversity by retaining alternative procedures and recognising the unique regulatory and land tenure context of each State and Territory. 7. Promote integration with cultural heritage frameworks, ensuring that native title and heritage processes are coordinated, culturally appropriate, and not duplicative. Such a regime would balance the rights of Traditional Owners with the need for timely and transparent land access, supporting both cultural integrity and economic development.
Question 6 – Native Title Management Plans	Should the NTA be amended to enable PBCs to develop management plans (subject to a registration process) that provide alternative procedures for how future acts can be validated in the relevant determined area?	Oppose.	The WA Government strongly opposes this reform as an alternative statutory procedure for validating future acts. The NTMP proposal presents significant legal, administrative, and strategic challenges that would undermine the integrity of the existing agreement-making system and the State's land use management frameworks.

			The proposal would also create substantial uncertainty for government, industry, and native title parties alike. The WA Government considers the NTMP proposal to be legally and practically unworkable and recommends that reform efforts focus on strengthening existing mechanisms (such as ILUA) that support negotiated, transparent, and coordinated outcomes.
Question 7 – Mandatory Conduct and Content Standards	Should the NTA be amended to provide for mandatory conduct standards applicable to negotiations and content standards for agreements, and if so, what should those standards be?	Support (pending further detail).	The WA Government cautiously supports mandatory conduct standards, subject to the content of those standards. The suggested standards include required information sharing, some of which may not be available at the outset of negotiations. Clarifying the role of government in negotiations will also need careful scrutiny. While native title parties should be afforded information which allows them to make decisions about proposed acts, a balance is required to ensure that requests for information are not a cause of unnecessary or unreasonable delay. In line with this, consideration should be given to adopting a "reasonableness test" for information requests. For example, a proponent should not be required to disclose commercially sensitive information under this reform.

Question 8 – Extension of Regulation to Ancillary Agreements	Should the NTA expressly regulate ancillary agreements and other common law contracts as part of agreement-making frameworks under the Future Acts Regime?	Neutral – Further investigation required.	This question requires further investigation to understand its impact in WA.
Question 9 – Assignment of Agreements	Should the NTA be amended to provide a mechanism for the assignment of agreements entered into before a positive native title determination is made and which do not contain an express clause relating to succession and assignment?	Neutral – Further investigation required.	This question requires further investigation but is unlikely to have a substantial impact in WA, noting the extent of native title recognition. Noting the obiter comments of Justice Mortimer in Tommy on behalf of the Yinhawangka Gobawarrah People v State of Western Australia [2023] FCA 857 have largely been accepted and acted upon, it would make sense to codify this.
Question 10 – Variations to Registered ILUAs	Should the NTA be amended to allow parties to agreements to negotiate specified amendments without needing to undergo the registration process again, and if so, what types of amendments should be permissible?	Support.	This proposed reform has the potential to streamline the current authorisation and registration processes where amendments to an ILUA are required.
Question 11 – Dispute Resolution via the NNTT	Should the NTA be amended to provide that new agreements must contain a dispute resolution clause by which the parties agree to utilise the NNTT's dispute resolution services, including mediation and binding arbitration, in relation to disputes arising under the agreement?	Support.	The WA Government expresses cautious support for this proposed reform, noting however that, taken together, the proposals advanced and reforms explored in the Discussion Paper would require a substantial uplift in the NNTT's resourcing and capability.

Question 12 – Public Register of Agreements and Redacting of Agreements	Should some terms of native title agreements be published on a publicly accessible opt-in register, with the option to redact and de-identify certain details?	Support.	This reform, if implemented, will improve transparency and consistency, as well as potentially creating de facto guidance for agreements. The WA Government suggests mandatory publication of agreements is considered, with redaction options for sensitive content agreed by the parties to the agreement (ie. an opt out rather than opt in approach with respect to published content).
Question 13 – Agreement with Native Title Claimants	What reforms, if any, should be made in respect of agreements entered into before a native title determination is made, in recognition of the possibility that the ultimately determined native title holders may be different to the native title parties to a pre-determination agreement?	Neutral – Further investigation required.	The WA Government cannot offer a position on this reform without understanding how it is proposed to be implemented Most agreements will have provisions dealing with this issue, whereas legislative amendments may have unintended consequences.
Question 14 – Reforms to Statutory Processes	Should Part 2 Division 3 Subdivisions G–N of the NTA be repealed and replaced with a revised system for identifying the rights and obligations of all parties in relation to all future acts, which: categorises future acts according to the impact of a future act on native title rights and interests; applies to all renewals, extensions, re-grants, and the re-making of future acts;	Oppose.	This proposed reform is strongly opposed as the ‘impact-based’ model is legally uncertain, administratively complex, and fundamentally inconsistent with State legislation, policy and/or processes. In the absence of an objective means of identifying impact, the categorisation of future acts is likely to be subject to legal challenge. Transitional provisions would also be required to cater for a new set of acts, which will further complicate the system rather than simplifying it.

	requires that multiple future acts relating to a common project be notified as a single project; provides that the categorisation determines the rights that must be afforded to native title parties and the obligations of government parties or proponents that must be discharged for the future act to be done validly; and provides an accessible avenue for native title parties to challenge the categorisation of a future act, to be determined by the NNTT?		Further work would be needed to define what a statutory right to be consulted would involve, which may itself lead to further litigation. Moreover, a binary approach to the impact of future acts on native title rights and interests is difficult to reconcile with the intricacies of WA's regulatory environment and will increase litigation, delay, and cost, as well as undermining the principle of equality by creating greater rights for native title holders than exist for freeholders under State laws.
Question 15 – Potential Exclusions to Impact-Based Assessment	If an impact-based model contemplated by Question 14 were implemented, should there be exclusions from that model to provide tailored provisions and specific procedural requirements in relation to specific matters?	Support (oppose Impact-based model).	The exclusions are supported to the extent that reforms to the statutory processes are progressed despite opposition from the WA Government. These exclusions are essential to a range of State activities related to infrastructure, lease renewals, and emergency services. A comprehensive review of State legislation is needed to identify other necessary exclusions, but is not possible in the timeframe.
Question 16 – 'Beyond Act' Impacts	Should the NTA be amended to account for the impacts that future acts may have on native title rights and interests in areas outside of the immediate footprint of the future act?	Oppose.	This proposed reform is strongly opposed by the WA Government as it cuts across various existing State and Federal legislation relating to Aboriginal cultural heritage and environmental regulation (including in relation to 'social surrounds').

			Further, defining and assessing impacts beyond the immediate disturbance, footprint or boundary of future acts, in most cases, would require extensive investigation, which investigations would themselves be future acts. This difficulty is compounded by taking into account cultural impacts. The reform introduces unacceptable uncertainty, create litigation risk for the WA Government in respect of its regulatory role, and would be fundamentally unworkable.
Question 17 – Legislative Acts	Should the NTA be amended to: exclude legislative acts that are future acts from an impact-based model as contemplated by Question 14, and apply tailored provisions and specific procedural requirements instead; and clarify that planning activities conducted under legislation (such as those related to water management) can constitute future acts?	Oppose.	The WA Government does not support applying the 'impact-based model' to legislative acts, which have broad application and differential effects. The application of procedural rights under the NTA would be practically unworkable and is highly likely to fetter unconstitutionally the WA Parliament's legislative powers. Question 17 also identifies planning activities under State legislation such as water management as possible future acts that should attract procedural rights. This is strongly opposed as it lacks an understanding of WA's regulatory environment. At worst, the reform is fundamentally inconsistent with consultation principles under land use planning legislation.

Question 18 – Test to be Applied where NTP Objects to Future Act	What test should be applied by the NNTT when determining whether a future act can be done if a native title party objects to the doing of the future act?	Support (conditional).	The WA Government supports this reform with the following condition: 1. A multi-factorial test must be applied that includes consideration of existing statutory criteria (including the economic significance of the act and the public interest in the doing of the act), whether the native title party's consent was unreasonably withheld, and whether the future act would present a real risk of substantial and irreparable harm.
Question 19 – Criteria to Inform	What criteria should guide the NNTT when determining the conditions (if any) that attach to the doing of a future act.	Support (conditional).	The WA Government supports this reform with the following conditions: 1. Conditions placed on the doing of future acts must be consistent with State legislation, policy and practice; 2. Conditions placing restrictions on trade and investment (e.g. domestic-only sales) should be avoided, if not expressly prohibited.
Question 20 – Alternative Procedures	Should a reformed Future Acts Regime retain the ability for States and Territories to legislate alternative procedures for future acts?	Neutral.	Retaining the alternative procedure provisions preserves flexibility for States to legislate tailored future act procedures, maintaining jurisdictional autonomy and allowing for processes that meet the needs of individual PBCs. A streamlined process to obtain the approval of the Commonwealth Minister should be considered to ensure barriers are minimised.

			Commonwealth consideration should be limited to ensuring alternative procedures are legally robust and do not conflict with federal legislation.
Question 21 – Non-claimant applications	Should Pt 2 Div 3 Subdiv F of NTA be amended: to provide that non-claimant applications can only be made where they are made by, or for the benefit of, Aboriginal or Torres Strait Islander peoples; [or]… in some other way?	Neutral.	The WA Government does not express a view on this proposed reform as non-claimant applications are not utilised by the WA Government (and not generally utilised in WA).
Question 22 – Consequences of Invalidity	If the NTA is amended to expressly provide that non-compliance with procedural obligations would result in a future act being invalid, should the NTA expressly address the consequences of invalidity?	Support.	The WA Government agrees that consequences for non-compliance with the procedural obligations of the NTA should be clarified. This will provide greater certainty to government, industry and PBCs on the implications of invalid acts. This proposed reform must be carefully considered and calibrated to reflect the complex intersections with State legislation outlined throughout this submission. In particular, any reform must avoid a disproportionate response to invalidity that may ultimately be the result of human error. The constitutional impacts of this proposal must also be considered (ie. confirming that the Commonwealth has the power to invalidate acts for all purposes), as well as other commercial and litigation risks it may precipitate.

Question 23 – Content of Future Act Notices	Should the NTA or the Native Title (Notices) Determination be amended to prescribe in more detail the information that should be included in a future act notice and if so, what information or what additional information should be prescribed?	Support.	This reform could improve the quality of information provided to PBCs, aiding informed decision-making without imposing excessive burdens. Care should be taken in defining any minimum content standards and the impact on existing State legislation and processes. Confidentiality and the disclosure of third-party information should be part of these considerations.
Question 24 – Future Act Payments	Should the NTA be amended to provide that for specified future acts, an amount which may be known as 'future act payment' is payable to the relevant native title party prior to or contemporaneously with the doing of the future act?	Oppose.	The WA Government strongly opposes these proposed reforms. It sees no principled basis for a Future Act Payment unless it is directly referable (and set off from) compensation for impact on native title rights and interests. Even if these conditions were satisfied, the proposed reform is apt to create confusion in the context of the varied role the WA Government has in the Future Acts Regime. Calculating a Future Act Payment on the basis of the bifurcated approach set out in the Timber Creek decision prior to the act being done (and cultural loss having been suffered) will be challenging, if not impossible. Careful consideration will need to be given to the basis on which a Future Act Payment is calculated, to avoid exceeding the entitlement to compensation.

Question 25 – Future Act Payments and Compensation	How should 'future act payments' interact with compensation that is payable under Part 2 Division 5 of the NTA?	Oppose.	See above.
Question 26 – Short Form Agreements	Should the NTA be amended to provide for a form of agreement, which is not an Indigenous Land Use Agreement, capable of recording the terms of, and basis of, a future act payment and compensation payment for future acts?	Support (pending further details).	The WA Government supports further investigation of this reform, conditional upon the form of agreement and class of acts being clear and subject to standing instructions. The reform may not be viable or worthwhile progressing if the circumstances covered by Short Form Agreements are too narrow. The WA Government does not agree that the only method of agreeing compensation is via an ILUA. Ancillary agreements pursuant to section 31 of the NTA regularly provide for compensation and compensation can be agreed by way of a Deed.
Question 27 – Costs Awards for Future Act Matters	Should the NTA be amended to expressly address the awarding of costs in Federal Court proceedings relating to Future Acts Regime and, if so, how?	Support.	The WA Government supports the position that each party to a proceeding relating to a future act matter should bear its own costs.
Question 28 – Native Title and Aboriginal Cultural Heritage	Should the NTA be amended to provide for requirements and processes to manage the impacts of future acts on Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander cultural heritage, and if so how?	Neutral – Further investigation required.	The Aboriginal cultural heritage laws overlap with the Future Acts Regime, the lack of integration between these systems often results in procedural duplication, gaps in protection, and inconsistent engagement with Traditional Owners.

51. (xxi.) Marriage[200]:

Historical Note.—"Marriage and divorce" is specified in the British North America Act, sec. 91, sub-sec. 26. "Recognition in other colonies of any marriage or divorce duly solemnized or decreed in any colony" was a subject which might be referred to the Federal Council under the Act of 1885. In the Bill of 1891, and also in the Adelaide draft of 1897, "Marriage and divorce" was one of the legislative powers.

At the Sydney session, a suggestion by the House of Assembly of Tasmania was submitted, to omit the sub-clause and substitute "The status, in other States of the Commonwealth, of persons married or divorced in any State." Mr. Glynn said that there were strong objections in South Australia to the prospect of the grounds of divorce in that colony being extended as they had been in New South Wales and Victoria. The sense of the desirability of uniform laws of marriage and divorce prevailed, however, and the sub-clause was agreed to. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 1077-82.) At the Melbourne session, before the first report, "Marriage" was placed in a separate sub-clause.

Marriage is a relationship originating in contract, but it is something more than a contract. It is what is technically called a status, involving a complex bundle of rights, privileges, obligations, and responsibilities which are determined and annexed to it by law independent of contract. According to the law of England a marriage is a union between a man and a woman on the same basis as that on which the institution is recognized throughout Christendom, and its essence is that it is (1) a voluntary union, (2) for life, (3) of one man and one woman, (4) to the exclusion of all others. (Bethell v. Hildyard, 38 Ch. D. 220.)

Laws relating to this subject will therefore embrace (1) the establishment of the relation, including preliminary conditions, contractual capacity, banns, license, consent of parents or guardians, solemnization, evidence, and rules in restraint, (2) the consequences of the relation, including the status of the married parties, their mutual rights and obligations, the legitimacy of children and their civil rights. Quaere whether this power will enable the Parliament to legislate with respect to breach of promise of marriage; immoral agreements concerning marriage; and the separate property of married women. It could be argued that the first two matters belong to the general law of contracts, and the last one to the general law relating to civil rights; both of which classes of laws are reserved to the States. It might be said, however, that they impinge on the principal grant of power, "marriage," and are conveyed by it.

In considering the validity of a marriage the requirements of two kinds of laws, not always coinciding in the same political community, have to be regarded; one is the law of the domicile—that is, the law of the country which the contracting parties look upon as their permanent home; the other is the law of the place in which the contract is made, or where the ceremony is performed. As regards the essential qualification and capacity to enter into the marriage relation, both the lex loci contractus and the lex domicilii must apparently be satisfied; the formal requisites, the mode of solemnization and the like, depend upon the lex loci contractus alone. (Westlake, Priv. Internat. Law, pp. 52-5.)

The policy of the Imperial Government, to secure uniformity of marriage laws among the Christian races of the Empire, is shown in the manner in which several colonial Acts to legalize marriage with deceased wife's sister have been discountenanced and disallowed. Such amending laws have been, however, at length sanctioned by the Crown in Ceylon, South Australia, Victoria, Tasmania, New South Wales, Queensland, Western Australia, New Zealand, Canada, and Barbadoes. In the countries in which the parties are domiciled the children of these marriages are legitimate by statute law, but in the United Kingdom, these marriages being still regarded as illegal, the offspring are liable to serious disabilities. By the law of England, "with regard to personal property the children of these marriages are regarded as legitimate; but with respect to realty, the status of legitimacy, which the law of the domicile gives them, is not recognized, on the ground that the established rule of law in deciding the title of real estate, lex loci rei sitæ, excludes such children." (Hammick's Marriage Law of Eng. and Cols. p. 253.)

"In regard to such legislation the difficulty still remains, that the Imperial Parliament has not yet (1892) agreed to this alteration in the law of marriage. Consequently, such marriages continue to be illegal in England, and those who avail themselves of the liberty afforded by colonial enactments to contract these marriages expose their offspring to disastrous consequences, as regards both inheritance and legitimacy, in the mother country. Hitherto, the Imperial Government and Parliament have shown no disposition to alter the law in this respect, for the behoof of the colonies in question." (Todd's Parl. Gov. in Col. 2nd ed. 198.)

The personal capacity of parties to enter into the contract of marriage depends upon their domicile; and where both parties had a foreign domicile, and, by the law of their domicile, their marriage was invalid by reason of consanguinity, a marriage which was contracted in England, and which would have been valid according to English law, was held invalid. (Sottomayor v. De Barros, 3 P.D. 1. Digest of English Case Law, vol. vii. p. 626.)

A foreign marriage, valid according to the law of the country where it is celebrated, is good everywhere; but this applies only to the form, and not to the essentials of the contract, which depend on the lex domicilii. Therefore, if a marriage abroad of English domiciled subjects is polygamous or incestuous, the law of England will not recognize it, and will follow in that respect its own rules as to incest and policy. (Brook v. Brook, 9 H.L. Cas. 193. Id.)

When an English woman marries a domiciled foreigner, the marriage is constituted according to the lex loci contractus; but she takes his domicile, and is subject to his law. (Harvey v. Farnie, 8 App. Cas. 43. Digest of English Case Law, vol. viii. p. 215.)

The rule, that the lex loci contractus of a marriage establishes its validity, requires this qualification—that where the law of a country forbids marriage under any particular circumstances, the prohibition follows the subjects of that country wherever they may go. Each nation has a right to define and prohibit incest. If a marriage, though good according to the law of the domicile, were nevertheless contrary to the religious or moral notions of other States, it would be impossible to contend that it ought to be adopted by them. If the comity of nations were always to prevail, a foreign marriage between uncle and niece, under papal dispensation, must be held valid, and the issue might claim to take a Scotch estate and Scotch honours, although, had the marriage been contracted in Scotland, the parties might have been capitally punished. (Fenton v. Livingstone, 3 Macq. H.L. 497. Id. 216.)

British subjects resident in a British settlement abroad are governed by the laws of England, and consequently, with respect to marriage, by the law of which existed there before the Marriage Act, viz., the canon law. (Lautour v. Teesdale, 2 Marsh, 243. Id. p. 217.)

51. (xxii.) Divorce[201] and matrimonial causes[202]; and in relation thereto, parental rights[203], and the custody and guardianship of infants[204]:

HISTORICAL NOTE.—For the history of the sub-section "marriage and divorce," see Historical Note, sub-sec. xxi. At the Adelaide session, in 1897, a new sub-clause "Parental rights, and the custody and guardianship of infants" was added. It was thought, however, that, except incidentally to matrimonial suits, the control of children was not a federal matter, and accordingly at the Sydney session the sub-clause was attached to the preceding one, so as to read "Marriage and divorce, and in relation thereto, parental rights, and the custody and guardianship of infants." (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, pp. 1082-5.) At the Melbourne session, before the first report, "Marriage" was placed in a separate sub-clause, and the words "and matrimonial causes" were added.

Divorce is the termination and dissolution of the marriage relation, by process of law, for causes assigned. Among these causes are generally recognized such acts or omissions as are inconsistent and incompatible with, and in violation of, the marriage state, such as adultery, cruelty, and desertion; causes less generally recognized are the perpetration of crimes leading to imprisonment for a lengthened period; and persistence in habits that disqualify for the marriage state, such as habitual drunkenness and the neglect of matrimonial obligations. The object of this sub-section is to enable the Federal Parliament to abolish the varied and conflicting divorce laws which prevail in the States, and to establish uniformity in the causes for which divorce may be granted throughout the Commonwealth. This is considered advisable in order to avoid the great mistake made by the framers of the Constitution of the United States of America, who left the question to the States to deal with as they respectively thought proper. It has been well said, that if there is one defect in that Constitution more conspicuous than another it is its inability to provide a number of contiguous and autonomous communities with uniformity of legislation on subjects of such vital and national importance as marriage and divorce. At present persons who, according to the law of the State in which they reside, would have no right to a divorce, may become domiciled in another State by living there a certain time, and then, according to the laws of that State, may obtain a divorce for reasons which, in their own State, would have been insufficient. In some cases they may be divorced without a domicile. All these circumstances point to the conclusion that, unless we wish to repeat, in these communities, the condition of things which has obtained in America, it is necessary to provide for uniformity in the law of divorce. (Mr. R. E. O'Connor and Mr. I. A. Isaacs, Conv. Deb., Syd., p. 1080.)

By the old instructions to colonial Governors, still in use in the Australian colonies at the establishment of the Commonwealth, a Governor was required not to assent to any bill for the divorce of persons joined together in holy matrimony unless such bill contained a clause suspending its operation until the royal pleasure thereon was signified; otherwise they must be reserved. The royal assent to such reserved bills has been frequently refused. Thus a bill passed by the Parliament of New South Wales to enable a wife to obtain divorce on the sole ground of her husband's adultery, and one by Victoria authorizing a divorce for desertion for four years without reasonable cause, failed in the first instance to receive the royal assent, on the ground that they would occasion confusion throughout the Empire as to the status of persons so divorced, and of their offspring. Subsequently these bills received the royal assent and became law. (Todd's Parl. Gov. in Col. 2nd ed. 197-8.) The present instructions to the Governor-General of Canada do not contain the paragraph embodied in the old instructions above referred to, and in all probability it will not appear in the instructions to the Governor-General of the Commonwealth.

"I would ask hon. members to recollect the view we have taken about the condition of the English law with respect to marriage with a deceased wife's sister. I think every colony has petitioned the English Parliament on that subject. I know that when we were at home in 1887, we all agreed in making a particular request to the Imperial Government to bring in an Act to prevent the unpleasant and anomalous condition of the laws by which people, married in the colonies, when they reached England were not married. We only have to remember the attitude we took when we were unanimous amongst ourselves against the mother country, which has a different line of legislation, to understand that we ought to do that amongst ourselves which we wanted England to do towards us. What subject is more fitted for general legislation? In what subject do we want a universal law more than that dealing with the most sacred relations, that concern not merely the individuals who are parties to the contract, or whatever you please to call it, but also those who are to come afterwards? Anyone who seriously considers the social feelings of pain and grief, and worry and trouble, caused by a differentiation of the laws of the colonies, as between themselves, on this most vital subject, must agree that something ought to be done to prevent the anomaly." (Sir John Downer, Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 1081.)

"A foreign tribunal has no authority, so far as consequences in England are concerned, to pronounce a decree of divorce à vinculo in the case of an English marriage between English subjects, unless such subjects are, at the time of such decree pronounced, bona fide domiciled in the country where that tribunal has jurisdiction, and the suit is prosecuted without collusion. (Shaw v. Gould, 37 L.J. Ch. 433. Dig. of Eng. Case Law, viii. p. 226.)

A wife's domicile is that of her husband, and her remedy for matrimonial wrongs must, as a general rule, be sought in the courts of that domicile; and, therefore, the wife of a man not domiciled in England cannot maintain a suit for restitution of conjugal rights if her husband has left the jurisdiction before the commencement of the proceedings. (Firebrace v. Firebrace, 47 L.J. Prob. 41. Id. p. 225.)

The word domicile has many meanings, according as it is used with reference to succession and other purposes. A person may have retained a foreign domicil for many purposes, and yet may be domiciled in England, so as to give jurisdiction to the court for divorce; but if he has never resided in England except temporarily, and is not there at the time of the commencement of the suit, he is not subject to its jurisdiction. (Yelverton v. Yelverton, 1 Sw. and Tr 574. Id. p. 223.)

Great caution ought to be observed in allowing a petition for divorce to proceed in the English Divorce Court where there is ground for supposing that the parties are domiciled out of the jurisdiction. (Sinclair's Divorce Bill, 1897, App. Ca. 469. Dig. of Eng. Case Law, vol. vii. p. 730.)

When the domicile of the parties is English, the jurisdiction of the court is founded, though the marriage and adultery may have taken place abroad. (Ratcliff v. Ratcliff, 29 L.J. Mat. 171. Id.)

For the purposes of the jurisdiction of the Divorce Court, the British colonies, as well as Scotland and Ireland, are deemed to be foreign countries. (Firebrace v. Firebrace, 47 L.J. Prob. 41. Id. p. 733.)

§ 202. "Matrimonial Causes."

The matters contemplated and covered by this grant of power are those subsidiary and consequential to marriage and divorce. They will naturally include judicial separation, restitution of conjugal rights, nullity of marriage, jactitation, damages against an adulterer, and probably maintenance of wives and children and marriage settlements.

§ 203. "Parental Rights."

The Parliament has power to legislate respecting the rights of parents to their children, but only in relation to divorce and matrimonial causes. Outside and independent of the area covered by divorce and matrimonial causes, the power of the States to deal with parental rights remains unaltered. The power to determine the parental rights of divorced or separated persons with respect to children of the marriage, is a necessary corollary of the power to dissolve the union by divorce, or to suspend it by judicial separation; one is an essential incident and should be the sequence of the other. Without this conjunction of power the Parliament, whilst able to pass a uniform law of divorce and judicial separation, would be unable to pass a uniform law of parental rights to be enforced in such suits. It would be anomalous for a Federal law to dissolve or suspend a marriage, and for a State law to decide the destiny of the children of the marriage.

At common law a father is entitled to the custody of the child at its mother's breast, and the court, in making an order as to the custody, pendente lite, will not, unless some good cause is shown, take away this right. (Cartledge v. Cartledge, 31 L.J. Mat. 85. Dig. of Eng. Case Law, vol. vii. p. 789.)

In making an interim order as to the custody of the children, the court will adhere to, or depart from, the common law rule, according to its discretion. (Spratt v. Spratt, 1 Sw. and Tr. 215. Id.)

A divorce and matrimonial court has jurisdiction by its order to regulate the custody of children until they attain the age of sixteen. (Mallinson v. Mallinson, 35 L.J. Mat. 84.) But the court has no jurisdiction to make any order as to the custody of children upwards of sixteen years of age. (Ryder v. Ryder, 30 L.J. Mat. 44. Id. p. 788.)

In exercising its discretion in the matter of access to children by their parents, pending suit, the court is mainly influenced by consideration for the interests of the children. (Philip v. Philip, 41 L.J. Prob. 89.)

§ 204. "Custody and Guardianship of Infants."

The power of the Parliament to legislate concerning the custody and guardianship of infants is not a general one ; it is limited to divorce and matrimonial causes. Apart from that jurisdiction the States retain their former authority in respect to these matters. (Conv. Deb., Adel., 1897, p. 1085.)

51. (xxiii.) Invalid and old-age pensions[205] :

Historical Note.—This sub-section was first proposed by Mr. Howe, at the end of the Sydney session in 1897, but was not then dealt with. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1082, 1085-8.) At the Melbourne session, Mr. Howe proposed it again, when after a short debate it was carried by 26 votes to 4. (Conv. Deb., Melb., pp. 1991-6.)

§ 205. "Invalid and Old-age Pensions."

In considering Mr. J. H. Howe's proposal to place this sub-section in the Constitution, the question debated was not the policy or practicability of giving governmental pensions to poor and aged persons, but whether such a power ought to be left to the States or added to the functions of a Federal Parliament. Those who doubted the wisdom of the proposal argued that it was a matter which stood in the same category as State Banking and State Insurance ; that it was a branch of the charitable systems which existed in the States ; that it could be best dealt with by each State apart from the Federal authority ; that it might involve embarrassing financial issues ; that it would tend to load the Constitution with a social problem of complexity and magnitude, which had better be reserved for the States. In reply to these arguments it was said that the Federal authority would occupy a superior vantage-ground which would enable it to deal effectively and comprehensively with the subject, which could not be done by the disunited efforts of the States. Such a law should be uniform so as to reach and regulate the rights and obligations of those who were migratory in their habits. "The people who would benefit most by this provision," said Mr. Howe, "are a moving population. They are engaged in seeking work all over Australia, and are constantly going to those places which, for the time being, are more prosperous than other places. Our labouring classes will be a nomadic race for a considerable time to come. If the State took this matter in hand, and made payments compulsory, it could not follow a contributor to the fund from one State to another. The duty is one which can only be performed by the Federal authority. (Conv. Deb., Syd., 1897, p. 1086.)

"In these Colonies," said the same hon. gentleman, "men are born in one State, spend their manhood and best days in another, and then return, broken down and unfortunate, to the land of their birth, which owes them nothing. Is it to be contended that under such circumstances the State of the unfortunate man's birth should be compelled to support him ? Surely the support of the aged poor could be better accomplished by a Federated Australia. Wherever a man may roam within the boundaries of Federated

Thanks for your enquiry.

The Department of Health is only able to provide responses to your questions that relate to the business of the Department.
I have listed your questions below with responses provided that were available from the Department of Health.
I have also indicated where you will need to ask for information from the Office of the Registrar of Births Deaths and Marriages (RBDM) at the Department of Justice.
If, after receiving this information from the Department of Health and any other information from the RBDM, you still wish to seek information from the CEO of St John of God Health Services you will need to email them directly regarding their policies and practices.

1. Can you please confirm where do Birth Registration Statements go when the hospital submits a registration for a newborn child?
   This is a question for the RBDM

2. Can you please confirm whether the hospital is responsible and classed as 'responsible person' for the notification of birth?
   This is a question for the RBDM

3. For an offspring born alive does the hospital hold any record of said vital records event for first year or 2 or 5 or however long?
   For WA Health, the Patient Information Retention and Disposal Schedule provides instructions based upon the requirements of the State Records Act 2000. The Schedule specifies that hospital medical records must be kept for 60 years after the last entry and that forms used for statutory notification of birth must be retained for 25 years (i.e. for 7 years after the child born has turned 18 years of age). Private hospitals will have similar policies.

4. What happens with the placenta after it gets weighed?
   Depending on individual situations:
   The placenta may have all blood collected and sent for storage in a cord blood centre. Some of these processes are managed by Red Cross as a donation and others are private arrangements where the cord blood is stored at the family's expense for future use by the family.
   The placenta may be sent to pathology for macroscopic or microscopic examination or for testing for infection or other suspected conditions.
   Some parents request that they are given their placenta to take home. At discharge the placenta is provided in a sealed and labeled container, it would have been refrigerated or frozen before being provided. Information relating to safe disposal is also provided.
   Mostly placentas are sent for disposal via the health service's medical waste disposal process.

5. Does the placenta get registered at all in any registry, sub-registry, or index or any database at all whether in Australia or overseas or another territory?
   No. But for cord blood storage, records would be required to be maintained by the storage centre.

6. Does the Funeral Director report an incomplete death regarding on the placenta?
   Not sure what is being asked here. But this might be a question to the RBDM regarding the process of death certificate provision to the RBDM from doctor via the funeral director.

7. What ultimately happens with Placenta from moment its taken away to the moment it is disposed of?
   Described above, depends on circumstances and wishes.

8. How is it disposed of?
   Described above, depends on circumstances and wishes.

Don't at all mind that you suggested your enquiry be forwarded directly to General Manager of St John of God's Subiaco and/or the CEO.
I would however recommend that the RBDM is the best person to seek information from on the requirements to be met regarding that Act.
To seek information from the Registrar's Office at the Department of Justice you can forward your enquiry to the Registrar at bdm@justice.wa.gov.au

THE LAW REFORM COMMISSION OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA

Project No 25 – Part I

Legal Capacity of Minors

WORKING PAPER

JANUARY 1972

INTRODUCTION

The Law Reform Committee has been asked to consider the recommendations contained in the New South Wales Commission's Report on Infancy in Relation to Contracts and Property as they relate to the laws in Western Australia and make recommendations in relation thereto.

The Committee has now completed its first consideration of the matter and issues this working paper. The paper does not necessarily represent the final views of the Committee.

Comments and criticisms are invited. The Committee requests that they be submitted by 28 February 1972 as legislation in this matter is likely at an early date.

Copies of the paper are being forwarded to:

- The Chief Justice and Judges of the Supreme Court
- The Judges of the District Court
- The Law Society
- The Magistrates' Institute
- The Law School
- The Crown Law Department
- The Public Trustee
- The Child Welfare Department
- Bodies concerned with occupations for which minimum ages are prescribed
- Political bodies
- Trustee companies
- Other Law Reform Commissions and Committees with which this Committee is in correspondence.

A notice has been published in The West Australian newspaper inviting those interested to obtain a copy of the paper and to send their comments to the Committee.

The research material on which this paper is based is at the offices of the Committee and will be made available on request.

PART I

TERMS OF REFERENCE, BACKGROUND AND METHOD OF APPROACH

1. "To consider the recommendations contained in the report of the New South Wales Law Reform Commission on Infancy in Relation to Contracts and Property as they relate to the laws of Western Australia and to make recommendations in relation thereto".

2. The New South Wales Law Reform Commission recommended (see Report, L.R.C.6, paragraph 25) that the age of majority be reduced from 21 to 18 years so far as concerned the matters within its terms of reference. These were: "To review the law of infancy relating to contracts and dispositions of property and testamentary capacity, and incidental matters". The Commission interpreted these terms as requiring it to consider the law which would apply to those who are below whatever age of majority was adopted and concluded that this was a field in which the law ought to be codified (Report, L.R.C.6, paragraph 34).

3. The Commission included in the report a draft bill embodying its proposals. The Minors (Property and Contracts) Act 1970 (N.S.W.) gave effect to the recommendations of the Commission.

4. Shortly after the reference set out in paragraph 1 above, the Government announced its intention to introduce legislation to 'lower from 21 to 18 years the age of responsibility for all citizens' of the State (Governor's speech at the opening of Parliament, on 15 July 1971). The Committee has accordingly accepted that it has been settled as a matter of policy that the age of majority is to be reduced to 18 years and has not dealt with the question whether it should be so reduced. This question is discussed both in the report of the English Committee on the Age of Majority (The Latey Committee - see Cmnd. 3342) and in the report of the New South Wales Law Reform Commission referred to above.

5. In this working paper the Committee has therefore confined its attention to considering:

(a) the changes to be made to the law in Western Australia to give effect to the Government's intention to lower the age of majority to 18 years (see below, Part II, paragraphs 8 to 27).

(b) the desirability of enacting a code along the lines of the New South Wales legislation (see paragraph 2 above) governing the legal capacity of persons under that age in relation to contracts and property (see below, Part III, paragraphs 28 to 56).

6. The Committee in its consideration of the subject has compiled a list of the Western Australian statutory provisions referring to age qualifications and limitations. The list is attached as an Appendix to this paper and divided into three Parts. The provisions in Part C of the Appendix are not directly relevant to the terms of reference, but may usefully provide a background when considering legislation based on age distinctions.

7. Two incidental matters may conveniently be dealt with first:

(1) The Latey Committee in its Report (Cmnd. 3342, paragraph 133) under a heading" A Minor Detail" says:

> "The young, and all the sensible people connected with them, find it quite ludicrous that legally speaking a married man with three children and a car can be referred to as an 'infant'. Of all our conclusions the easiest we have found to arrive at is that this word should no longer be used and that the word 'minor' should instead be substituted for those under the age of majority".

The New South Wales Commission adopted the term 'minor' and we propose to do so as well.

(2) At common law a person attains a specified age at the commencement of the day preceding the relevant anniversary of his birthday (Re Shurey: Savory v. Shurey [1918] 1 Ch. 263). Both the Latey Committee (Cmnd. 3342, paragraph 515) and the New South Wales Commission (L. R. C. 6, App. G, paragraph 48) proposed that this rule be changed to make the commencement of the anniversary day itself the relevant time. We agree with these bodies that the law on this point is at variance with the ordinary ideas of the meaning of language and we suggest a similar change.

PART II

REDUCTION OF THE AGE OF MAJORITY

AREAS OF THE LAW WHICH COULD BE INVOLVED

8. What is generally thought of as 'reducing the age of majority', is removing by legislation the whole or some major part of that lack of legal capacity which helps to distinguish the minor from the adult. We have assumed that this idea is incorporated in the words in paragraph 4 above, quoted from the Governor's speech. Those areas of the law in which these differences in capacity presently exist, may be categorised as follows:

(a) general legal capacity, involving mainly contractual and proprietary rights and liabilities (see paragraphs 10 to 15 below);

(b) civic rights and responsibilities, e.g. the obligation to serve on a jury (see paragraphs 17 to 20 below);

(c) age qualifications for entry into certain occupations (see paragraphs 21 & 22 below);

(d) terms and conditions of employment (see paragraph 23 below); and

9. In addition to New South Wales the following jurisdictions have enacted legislation reducing the age of majority:

(a) England (Family Law Reform Act 1969, Part I - reduction to 18 years);

(b) New Zealand (Age of Majority Act 1970 - reduction to 20 years);

(c) South Australia (Age of Majority (Reduction) Act 1970-1971 - reduction to 18 years).

All these jurisdictions generally grant legal capacity in relation to that area of the law referred to in subparagraph (a) of paragraph 8 above. There is some difference however in their treatment of the other areas mentioned in subparagraphs (b) to (e) of that paragraph.

General legal capacity - contractual and proprietary rights and liabilities

10. The Committee assumes that the Government's decision to reduce the age of majority to 18 years would at least include the granting of the legal capacities referred to in paragraph 8(a) above to persons in the 18 to 21 year old age group.

11. The New South Wales legislation effects its reform in this broad area by conferring the capacities set out below. Comments have been appended in each case.

(a) To freely enter into contracts and acquire and dispose of property.

Comment: The present disabilities of minors in this area are discussed in Part III of this paper. As incidental features, the legal rules of estoppel and acquiescence would also apply to them.

(b) To act in a fiduciary capacity.

Comment: Section 25 of the Administration Act provides that a minor cannot be granted administration of an intestate estate. Section 33 of that Act provides that if a minor is sole executor, administration may be granted to his guardian. Although apparently a minor is not disqualified as trustee, the disabilities incident to his minority would prevent him acting effectively as such. This is acknowledged by s.7(1) (g) of the Trustees Act, which provides for the appointment of another person in the place of a minor who is a trustee.

(c) To acquire a domicile of choice.

Comment: As a general rule a minor has the domicile of his father (7 Halsb. (3rd ed.), 23).

(d) To conduct proceedings in any court.

Comment: At present a person under 21 years cannot sue or defend in the Supreme Court or District Court except through a next friend or guardian ad litem (R.S.C. 0.70). The proposed change would add nothing to what is now permissible in the Local Court (Local Courts Act, s.57) or Warden's Court (Mining Act, s.237).

(e) To require, if absolutely entitled as beneficiary, the trustee to transfer the trust property to him.

Comment: Under the rule in Saunders v. Vautier (1841) 4 Beav. 115; 41 E.R. 482, this right is given to a person who is sui juris. The South Australian legislation expressly provided that this power did not apply to beneficiaries in respect of trusts already in existence, the reason being that the Government felt that the application of the rule might embarrass a trustee who had invested trust money for a fixed term on the assumption that the beneficiary would not be entitled to call for the trust property until he had attained the age of 21 years (Debates (S.A.) H. of A. 1970, p. 2011). The Committee has been informed that the application of the rule is not likely to result in similar embarrassment to the Public Trustee or to trustee companies in Western Australia. A restriction similar to that of South Australia seems therefore unnecessary.

(f) To consent to medical or dental treatment.

Comment: It should be noted that section 49 of the New South Wales Minors (Property and Contracts) Act 1970 provides that the consent of a minor aged 14 years or upwards is protection against a claim against the doctor or dentist for assault. In addition, the section provides that the consent of a parent or guardian of a minor aged less than 16 years is protection against a similar claim. The present law in Western Australia relating to the civil liability of a doctor or dentist who performs an operation on a minor without the consent of the minor's parent or guardian is not free from doubt. Section 338A of the > Health Act was enacted in 1962 to enable a doctor to perform a blood transfusion upon a person who is or appears to be under the age of 21 years, without the consent of the person's parent or guardian.

12. The New South Wales Minors (Property and Contracts) Act 1970 (s.3) also reduced to 18 years the age at which a person may make a valid will (see the First Schedule to that Act, amending ss. 3 and 6 of the New South Wales Wills, Probate and Administration Act 1898). The Law in Western Australia already enables persons in the 18 to 21 year old age group to make valid wills (the Wills Act 1970 (W.A.) s.7).

13. If the legal disabilities referred to in paragraph 11 above were removed from persons in the 18 to 21 year old age group it would no longer be necessary to provide for the guardianship of those persons. Thus the Guardianship of Infants Acts 1920 and 1926 should be amended to confine their operation to persons under 18 years of age.

14. It should perhaps be noted at this point that no change made in this State to the age of majority would affect the minimum age at which a person can marry without consent. This is a matter for the Commonwealth Parliament which at present has fixed the minimum age at 21 years (the Marriage Act 1961 (Cth.), ss. 5 and 13).

15. Part A of the Appendix lists those enactments which are related to general legal capacity and which the Committee considers should be amended to conform with the decision to lower the age of majority to 18 years.

16. In the remaining paragraphs of this Part the Committee draws attention to some of the considerations involved in deciding whether to grant persons in the 18 to 21 year old age group capacity in relation to the areas set out (b) to (e) of paragraph 8 above.

Civic rights and responsibilities

17. Another area in which minimum ages are prescribed is the civic field, for example, the minimum age at which a person can serve on a jury, vote or sit on a local council. Part B of the Appendix lists statutes in this field of which the Committee is aware. The reduction of the age of majority in the private law field need not necessarily be accompanied by a similar reduction in the civic law field. Indeed the Latey Committee expressed the view that the capacity "to cope adequately with one's own personal and private affairs" is a very different thing from a capacity "to measure up to public and civic responsibilities" (Report: Cmnd. 3342, paragraph 25). Specific higher age qualifications may thus be justified for some civic responsibilities.

18. The Committee has in mind the fact that the Parliament of Western Australia has already reduced the minimum age to 18 years in one important area, namely the right to vote in the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly elections (s.17 (1) of the Electoral Act 1907, as amended in 1970). Consistently therefore the voting age in Local Government elections should also be reduced to 18 years (Local Government Act 1960, s.45).

19. More doubtful perhaps is the question of the minimum age at which a person should be called upon to serve on a jury (at present 21 years - see Juries Act 1957, s.4(1)). We agree however with the Latey Committee which said "it would not actually keep us awake at night if people under 21 were to serve on a jury - if, that is, one 18-year-old were liable to take his seat with eleven older people, since it is statistically unlikely to be more" (Report: Cmnd. 3342, paragraph 25.)

20. Similar considerat1ons would appear to apply to the age qualifications for membership of the State Parliament (21 years - see the Constitution Acts Amendment Act 1899, ss.7 and 20) and of the Council of a local body (21 years - see the Local Government Act 1960, s.35).

Age qualifications for entry into certain occupations

21. The remainder of the statutes listed in Part B of the Appendix relate to the minimum age for entry into certain occupations. The list may not be complete.

22. The occupations field was outside the New South Wales Commission's terms of reference. However there would seem to be no reason why at this stage consideration should not be given to the question whether, in specific cases, the minimum ages should or should not be lowered. South Australia and New Zealand amended the Acts governing entry into certain occupations as part of the general reduction of the age of majority in those States. In some fields, such as law, the period of training is so long as to make it virtually impossible for a person to qualify before reaching 21 years of age and reference to a minimum age qualification seem unnecessary and may perhaps be omitted. The South Australian Parliament abolished minimum ages in certain occupations for this reason (the Age of Majority (Reduction) Act 1970-1971).

Terms and conditions of employment

23. This matter concerns conditions of employment, including minimum wages to be paid to those in the 18 to 21 year old age group. These are left untouched in New South Wales and in South Australia. Because of the special problems involved, such as the impact on individual employers and on the economy generally, there may be merit in not including the field of industrial relations within the general scope of legislation reducing the age of majority. The Committee is provisionally of the view that if the matter is to be investigated it should be studied by those having special knowledge of the area.

Special provisions aimed at protecting the young

24. There are some statutory provisions which are essentially protective in nature. However, in so far as they make distinctions on the basis of age, they are logically to be considered in connection with any proposal for generally lowering the age of majority. Here again, it is proper to observe that because it is thought advisable to extend responsibility in a particular area or areas, it does not necessarily follow that all other distinctions based on age should also be removed.

A list of provisions belonging to this category (not necessarily complete) follows:

(a) The Child Welfare Act, s.49 - which empowers the Minister to extend the period for which a child is committed to the care of the Department, up until the child is 21 years of age.

(b) The Criminal Code s 19(6a) (b) - which empowers the court to commit certain offenders under the age of 18 to the care of the Child Welfare Department until they are 18 or for 2 years, whichever is the longer.

(c) The Criminal Code, s.187 - which makes unlawful carnal knowledge of a girl under 16 a crime for which the maximum penalty is 5 years, unless the offender is under 21 in which event the offence is a misdemeanour for which the maximum penalty is 2 years.

(d) The Criminal Code, s.191(1) - which makes the procurement of a girl or woman under 21 a misdemeanour.

(e) The Criminal Code, s.194(3) - which makes it a misdemeanour for the keeper of a brothel to permit girls under 21 years of age to be in the brothel.

(f) Firearms and Guns Act, s.8(1) - which prohibits a person under 21 from holding a pistol licence.

(g) The Married Persons and Children (Summary Relief) Act, s.5 - defines 'dependant' as including a person under the age of 18 years, or who is over 16 but under 21 years of age and is receiving full-time instruction or training for a trade. Thus maintenance orders may be made in favour of such a person.

(h) Superannuation and Family Benefits Act, s.57(2) and s.6 - which provide for the payment of benefits in respect of children under 16 years of age or 'student children' (i.e. children not less than 16 years but under 21 years who are receiving full-time instruction). In our view, this provision should not be interfered with as it is essentially a question of contract between contributor and employer. The general law is not involved.

Some of these provisions may be difficult to justify, and this may be a suitable opportunity to re-assess the policy which gave rise to them. The Committee would welcome comments on these matters.

COMMITTEE'S TENTATIVE VIEWS

25. The Committee thinks that reform should certainly cover the area of law referred to in paragraphs 10 to 15 above (general legal capacity). The desirability of reform in this area is sufficiently established by the report of the New South Wales Law Reform Commission.

26. Further, there seems to be no real objection to the extension of reform to the field of civic rights and responsibilities (see paragraphs 17 to 20 above).

27. The areas referred to in paragraphs 22 (entry into certain occupations), 23 (conditions of employment) and 24 (special protective provisions) are matters involving social, economic or political assessment and the Committee has no definite views on them at this stage. The Committee would welcome comment from those with special knowledge of these fields.

PART III
CODIFICATION OF THE LAW OF LEGAL CAPACITY OF MINORS

28. This Part stands independently of Part II. Whatever the age of majority, the question still arises of the need to reform the law as to the legal capacity of those persons who happen to be under that age.

Paragraphs 29 to 37 below summarise the main features of the present law. The summary is necessarily a simplified statement. As the New South Wales Commission pointed out (L.R.C.6, App. A, paragraph 1), the law in this area is full of uncertainties and inconsistencies.

Paragraphs 38 to 53 below summarise the changes, or proposed changes in this field in other jurisdictions.

PRESENT LAW

Contracts

29. The legal effect on a minor of a contract entered into by him is summarised by Cheshire and Fifoot, Law of Contract (2nd. Aus ed., 1969, p.509) as follows:

"The general rule at common law [is] that a contract made by an infant [is] voidable at his option. The word 'voidable', however, [is] used in two different senses. Certain contracts by which he [acquires] some permanent or durable interest in property and which [create] obligations of a continuing nature [are] void- able in the sense that they [are] valid and binding upon him unless he [repudiates] them before, or within a reasonable time after, the attainment of his majority. Other contracts [are] voidable in a different sense, i.e., they [are] not binding upon the infant unless ratified by him when he [reaches] 21 years of age.

"Two types of transactions, namely beneficial contracts of service and contracts for necessaries, [are] treated as exceptional. The former [are] regarded as valid. The latter [impose] liability upon the infant, though whether this [is] of a contractual nature or not [is] a matter of controversy".

30. On the other hand, as Cheshire and Fifoot point out (ibid., p.523), because "infancy is a personal privilege of which no one can take advantage but the infant himself"

(Bacon's Abridgement, Infancy I, 4), at common law the other contracting party is bound.

31. In Western Australia certain contracts have been made binding on a minor by legislation. Instances are –

(a) the Housing Advances (Contracts with Infants) Act 1968 - which empowers a minor of or over the age of 18 years to enter into certain housing loan contracts;

(b) section 150 of the Land Act 1933 - which empowers a minor who is the holder of land under the Act to deal with it as if he were of full age, subject however to a review by the Supreme Court of the terms of the transaction.

Mention should also be made of s.82 of the Trustees Act 1962, which empowers the court to appoint a trustee to sell or deal with property in which the minor has a beneficial interest. To some extent this could overcome the general inability of a minor to enter into a binding contract involving a transfer of his property.

32. Even though a contract is not binding on a minor, he cannot recover money paid or property transferred unless there has been a total failure of consideration (Cheshire and Fifoot, ibid., p.523). Land may be an exception. According to Williams on Vendor and Purchase, (4th ed., 861) a minor may recover land even though the sale is completed.

On the other hand, at any rate in the absence of fraud, a minor is under no obligation to repay money or return property which has been already transferred to him (Cowern v. Nield [1912] 2 K.B. 419; Leslie (R) Ltd v. Sheill [1914] 3 K. B. 607).

33. A brief analysis of the types of contracts referred to by Cheshire and Fifoot is as follows:

(a) Contracts for necessaries:

These impose liability on a minor. Necessaries include goods and services and relate to the minor's particular station in life (Peters v. Fleming (1840) 6 M. & W. 42). Goods are not necessaries if the minor's existing supply is sufficient, a fact which may be unknown to the supplier. It is clear that under s.2 of the Sale of Goods Act 1895 (W.A.) where necessaries are sold and delivered to a minor he must pay a reasonable price therefor, but the law is not clear as to whether a minor is liable on an executory contract for necessaries.

(b) Beneficial contracts of service:

A minor is bound by a contract of service if it is on the whole for his benefit (Clements v. L. and N.W. Rwy. [1894] 2 Q.B. 482). This category does not extend to trading contracts (Cowern v. Nield [1912] 2 K.B. 419). The position is affected by the Industrial Arbitration Act 1912, Part VIII, which regulates inter alia apprenticeship agreements.

(c) "Voidable" contracts

The cases in which a contract is voidable in the sense that it binds both parties unless a minor repudiates before majority or within a reasonable time thereafter are:

(i) contracts concerning land,
(ii) shares in companies,
(iii) partnership agreements,
(iv) marriage settlements.

The effect of repudiation is to relieve the minor from all liabilities due to accrue after repudiation, but it appears that liabilities which have accrued before repudiation remain. For a more detailed account of these contracts, see Cheshire and Fifoot, ibid., pp. 517-519.

Other 'voidable' contracts, such as a contract for the loan of money, simply do not bind the minor (see Cheshire and Fifoot, quoted in paragraph 29 above). The rule as to ratification has been made stricter by s.15 of 9 Geo. IV, c.14 (Lord Tenterden's Act) which provides that ratification of a contract by a minor after he comes of full age is unenforceable unless in writing and signed by him. This statute was received in Western Australia as part of the law of England (see Cheshire and Fifoot, ibid., p.510).

Although 'voidable' contracts in the latter sense, where unaffected by statute, do not bind the minor, they may have certain legal effects, as indicated in paragraph 32 above.

Indirect enforcement of contractual obligations

34. Although generally speaking a minor is liable in tort in the same way as an adult, the courts will not permit him to be sued in tort if to do so would be indirectly to enforce a contract which is not binding on him (Cheshire and Fifoot, ibid., p.525). A minor is not liable if he induces another to contract with him by making a false representation, as for example that he is over 21 years of age. In such a case however the courts will permit a limited form of restitution (Cheshire and Fifoot, ibid., p.527).

Guarantees of minors' contracts

35. Where the contract is one that simply does not bind the minor there is no primary debt and, therefore, a guarantee of, that primary debt is void (Coutts & Co. v. Browne-Leaky [1947] K.B. 104). Where the contract is one which may be repudiated by the minor the obligation of the guarantor ends at the time of repudiation and he is not liable to pay the balance of the money under the contract (Land & Homes (W.A.) Ltd v. Roe (1936) 39 W.A.L.R. 27).

Principal and agent

36. It seems clear that a minor can be agent to make a contract which he has no capacity to make on his own behalf (Bowstead on Agency (13th ed., p.15)). There is some doubt whether a minor can be made liable on a contract by an agent where he would be bound if he had made the contract personally (Bowstead, ibid., p.13).

Dispositions of property by and to a minor

37. The effect of a disposition of property pursuant to a contract is set out in paragraphs 29 to 33 above. The general position regarding dispositions outside a contract is as follows:

Apparently a minor can effectually dispose of property by gift unless made under undue influence (Taylor v. Johnston (1882) 19 Ch.603. But cf. 18 Halsb. 369 where this decision is criticised). However a disposition by the minor by deed is voidable when he comes of age (21 Halsb. (3rd ed.) 160). Where property is given to a minor, it vests in the minor immediately upon the gift being completed. A gift inter vivos to a minor cannot afterwards be revoked (21 Halsb. (3rd ed.) 159). However a minor who has taken a freehold or leasehold estate in land may on reaching full age repudiate the grant, whereupon the estate re-vests in the grantor (Williams on Vendor and Purchaser, 4th ed. (1936), Vol.2, p.847). The same applies as regards personal property (21 Halsb. (3rd ed.) 158).

Under this heading may be noted s.30 of the Property Law Act, which empowers a married minor to give valid receipts for income paid over to him. This provision may, however, be superfluous: see Paget's Law of Banking, 6th ed., pp.24 & 25.

CRITICISM OF PRESENT LAW

38. The Latey Committee summarised the present position as follows:

> "It is uncertain in a number of important respects, and is not easy to apply to concrete facts. It is complex, and the complexities of the law are not related to the needs of persons affected by it. It is said that it is unfair to those who deal with infants and > disadvantageous to infants themselves in that others are deterred from dealing with them" (Cmnd. 3342, paragraph 273).

39. The New South Wales Law Reform Commission has also criticised the law to the same effect (L.R.C.6, App.A, paragraph 1).

REFORM AND PROPOSED REFORM IN OTHER PLACES

New South Wales

40. The New South Wales Commission recommended fundamental changes in the law relating to contracts and property transactions by minors, which were enacted in the Minors (Property and Contracts) Act 1970 (N.S.W.). The provisions are a code (see s.17) and take the place of the common law. Apart from attempting a general clarification of the law, the statute enacts that all beneficial contracts are binding on a minor (s.19). This alters the present law under which some only of such contracts are binding on the minor (see paragraphs 29 to 33 above).

41. Another important change made in New South Wales is that under s.26 power is given to the court to authorise a minor to enter into binding contracts and make binding dispositions of property. Limited power in this latter respect is also given to certain other authorities (ss. 28 and 29). The court is also given wide powers to adjust rights and liabilities in the case of the repudiation of a contract by a minor (s.37).

42. The following paragraphs summarise the relevant sections of the New South Wales statute:

The Act applies to the civil acts of minors. “Civil act” is defined with some particularity in s.6 but, broadly speaking, means any act relating to contractual rights or obligations or to any chose in action. The common law rule that lack of capacity to understand because of tender years renders a child incapable of the understanding necessary for the voluntary disposition of property or acceptance of a contract (Johnson v. Clark [1908] 1 Ch. 303) is preserved by s.18.

The Act provides that a civil act in which a minor participates is presumptively binding (i.e. binding unless void or voidable on grounds other than minority) on him in the following cases:

(a) if participation is for his benefit at the time it was entered into (s.19);

(b) if the consideration for a disposition of property made by or to him is not manifestly inadequate or excessive (s.20);

(c) in the case of a gift made by him, if the disposition is reasonable (s.21);

(d) if the civil act in question is made pursuant to a contractual or other duty binding on him (s.22);

(e) if the civil act is an investment in prescribed securities (s.23);

(f) if non-volunteer third parties without notice have acquired rights in property affected by the civil act, or altered their position in reliance on its validity (s.24) ;

(g) if the civil act is the giving of a receipt by a married minor for rents, profits or other income or for accumulation of income (s.25);

(h) if it is authorised or affirmed by a court (ss. 26, 27 and 30);

(i) in the case of a disposition of property, if the Public Trustee or a solicitor instructed and employed independently of any other party, certifies within the seven days preceding that the minor understands the purport and effect of the disposition and is acting freely and voluntarily and that the consideration is not manifestly inadequate or excessive (ss. 28 and 29);

(j) if it is affirmed by the minor after attaining full age, or by his representative in case of his death (s.30); and

(k) in the case of contracts that are not otherwise presumptively binding, if the contract is not repudiated in writing by him during his minority or within one year after he attains full age; or, if he dies before he attains full age, before the end of nineteen years after his birth or one year after his death, whichever is the earlier (ss. 31, 32, 34 and 38).

Outside these cases, a civil act is not presumptively binding (s.17). Where this is so and the minor lawfully repudiates, the Act gives the court wide power to adjust the rights of interested persons affected by the repudiation (s.37).

To preserve the equities, s.39 provides that a court is not to enforce a civil act in favour of a minor participant unless the act is also presumptively binding on the minor.

43. Part V of the New South Wales statute deals with ancillary matters –

(a) In substance, s.46 enables a minor to appoint an agent and act through him. The agent however, cannot bind him more than he can bind himself. The section also expressly provides that a minor can act as an agent.

(b) Section 47 overcomes the decision in Coutts & Co. v. Browne-Lecky (see paragraph 35 above) and binds a guarantor of an obligation of a minor to the extent to which he would be bound if the minor were not a minor.

(c) Section 48 provides that where a person under the age of 21 years is 'guilty of a tort', he is answerable for the tort whether or not the tort is connected with a contract. We take this to mean that, where a person would, but for the existence of a related contract, have been liable at law for a tort (see paragraph 34 above), he now becomes answerable for that tort, notwithstanding any connection it may have with the contract.

United Kingdom

44. The Latey Committee made certain tentative recommendations dealing with minor's contracts (Cmnd. 3342, paragraphs 271 to 427). It suggested that the recommendations should be referred to the English Law Commission for further study as part of a codification of the law of contracts (paragraphs 282 to 286). This has not been completed.

45. The Latey Committee's principal proposal was that contracts entered into by a minor should be unenforceable as such against him. The minor may perform the contract if he wishes, and may enforce performance against the other party, though only if he is willing to perform his part. But if the minor decides not to perform, or supplies a defective performance, he will escape liability for breach of contract. (Paragraph 299).

The Committee made the following recommendations in paragraphs 309 and 310 as to restitution and recovery of property:

(a) that where a minor receives money, property or services under a contract which he fails to perform he should be liable to account to the other party for the benefit he received,

(b) that the court should be empowered to relieve the minor from his liability to account, to such extent as it thinks fit,

(c) where the minor has parted with money or property under a contract which is unenforceable against him he should be entitled to the return of the money or property, subject to his obligation to account to the other party for any benefit he has received, if he resiles from the contract before it is fully performed.

46. The Committee proposed, in paragraphs 351 and 354, that a minor should be liable in tort for deceit unconnected with his age even if the effect would be indirectly to enforce a contract. On the other hand, because of the possibility that persons dealing with minors might be tempted to make a declaration as to age a standard provision in the contract, a minor should remain exempt from liability in tort for deceit as to his age which induces a contract.

New Zealand

47. In 1969 New Zealand codified the law relating to the contractual capacity of minors by enacting the Minors' Contracts Act 1969. This codification in some respects agrees with the suggestions of the Latey Committee, but in others it breaks new ground. It covers the effect, validity, avoidance, repudiation and ratification of minors' contracts and also contracts of indemnity and guarantee in respect of such contracts (s.15).

48. New Zealand has legislated separately for contracts entered into by minors over 18 years of age (s.5). Because of the Western Australian Government's decision to lower the age of majority to 18, the provisions dealing with this category of minors will not be summarised.

49. Contracts of those under 18 have effect as if the minor was of full age, except for the important proviso that they cannot be enforced against the minor (s.6). However, in the event of proceedings, or on application by interested parties, a court, if satisfied that the contract when made was fair and reasonable, may enforce the contract against or declare it binding on the minor. The court has ancillary powers of compensation or restitution or of ordering a transfer of property.

In exercising its discretion in dealing with contracts of the under-18 age group the court is directed to consider the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract, the subject-matter and nature of the contract, the nature and value of any property involved, the age and means of the minor and all other relevant circumstances (s.6(3)).

50. The powers of the court as regards compensation and restitution may be used to relieve not only parties to the contract but also guarantors, indemnifiers, and persons claiming through, under or on behalf of any of these. Adequate powers are given to order the transfer or assignment of relevant property to any party (s.7).

51. A minor's contract entered into pursuant to the approval of a magistrate's court has effect as if the contracting minor was of full age (s.9). On a reference for approval being made to him, the magistrate may request a report from a guardian of the minor, from an independent solicitor appointed by the court, from the Public Trustee, or from any other person.

52. Adult guarantors and indemnifiers of a minor's contract are also, as in New South Wales, made liable on their contract to the extent that they would be if the minor had been of full age. However, any rights the guarantor or indemnifier may have against the minor subsist, as far as the general provisions of the Act permit (s.10).

53. In 1970 New Zealand made a cautious reduction of the age of majority from 21 to 20 years. (See the Age of Majority Act 1970, s.4(1)).

COMMITTEE'S TENTATIVE VIEWS

54. To the extent suggested in this Part of the working paper, the Committee agrees that a reform of the law as to the capacity of minors is called for. The attempts of the courts to find logical solutions to the problems frequently posed in this area of the law appear not to have succeeded. The formulation of a code is not without its dangers and there are many and valid arguments generally against such a method of reform. However, the Committee is of the view at this stage that this is one field in which the adoption of a code is justified.

55. As between the New South Wales approach on the one hand and the English and New Zealand approach on the other, the Committee is inclined to favour that of New South Wales. The New South Wales Minors (Property and Contracts) Act 1970 is more specific and leaves less room for uncertainty.

56. It is not practicable, within the scope of this working paper, to set out the New South Wales legislation in great detail. Copies of the New South Wales legislation will be made available to readers of this paper, should they not have ready access to the legislation themselves.

APPENDIX

PART A

In the Committee's view the enactments listed hereunder relate to general legal capacity. Appropriate legislation will be needed to ensure that they conform to the new age of majority. In some cases, e.g. s 237 of the Mining Act, no change in the actual substance of the legislation is involved.

ADMINISTRATION ACT 1903

17 The court may authorise an executor or administrator to spend the infant's share of the estate on his maintenance.

17A The personal representatives of the deceased may appoint a trustee of the infant's share of the estate.

(3) is over 18, and detained against her will.

736 The court may divest a parent, guardian, master or mistress of the custody of a girl under 17. If the court finds that the parent, etc. has encouraged the seduction or prostitution of the girl.

DESTITUTE PERSONS RELIEF ORDINANCE 1845

3 It is an offence for a father or mother unlawfully to desert a child under l0 years old.

5 Persons about to leave the Colony must give surety for the maintenance of such of their children under 10 years old as are left behind.

11 Two Justices have power to bind as an apprentice a child who has attained the age of 10 years and in respect of whom a maintenance order has been made under the Act, until he or she attains the age of 18 years.

EDUCATION ACT 1928

3 & 13A "Leaving age" is defined as meaning the age of the child at the end of the school year in which he attains 15 years.

13(1) Attendance at school is compulsory for children under "leaving age".

13(4) The Minister may, under certain conditions, exempt a person who has attained 14 years of age from attending school.

ELECTORAL ACT 1907

17(1) Any person who is not under 18 years of age is entitled to be enrolled as an elector for the Legislative Council and the Legislative Assembly.

EVIDENCE ACT 1906

101(1) The evidence of a child of tender years may be received though not under oath where, in the opinion of the court, the child does not understand the nature of an oath. Such a child may be indicted and punished for perjury in all respects as of his evidence had been on oath.

EXPLOSIVES AND DANGEROUS GOODS ACT 1961

30(3) Explosives and other dangerous goods may not be sold to persons apparently under 18 years of age. (There are some specified exceptions. e.g. for bon-bon crackers, toy caps, streamer bombs, etc.)

FACTORIES AND SHOPS ACT 1963

5 "Child" is defined as meaning a person who is not of school leaving age as defined in s.3 of the Education Act 1928.

"Young person" is defined as meaning a person between leaving age and 16 years of age.

50 There is a prohibition on the employment of a ‘child’ except under certain conditions.

51 'Young persons' cannot work in factories between 9.00pm. and 6. 00am.

54 The certificate of age of certain 'young persons' must be produced.

55 Limitations are imposed on the working hours of ‘young persons’, except under certain circumstances.

62(1) (c) Minister may recommend that the Governor make regulations for the employment of 'young persons' where work may cause risk or injury to their health.

112 Parent may be fined if a 'young person' or 'child' is wrongfully employed.

FIREARMS AND GUNS ACT 1931

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES ACT 1894

14(7) Admission as a member of a friendly society may be as from birth.

A member of or over 16 years of age who is a minor may by himself, and a member under 16 years may by a parent or guardian, execute all instruments and give all acquittances necessary under the rules of the society.

Provided also that societies composed wholly of members under 16 years may be registered under the Act subject to special regulations.

HOUSING ADVANCES (CONTRACTS WITH INFANTS) ACT 1968

2 In the Act, 'infant' is defined as meaning an infant who has attained the age of 18 years.

3 Notwithstanding any law to the contrary, an 'infant' is capable:

(a) of entering into a contract with a lending authority for moneys to be advanced or lent by it to him for the purpose of erecting or purchasing a dwelling house for his occupation; and

(b) of executing a mortgage or other instrument by way of security for the repayment of any moneys advanced or lent or to be advanced or lent to the infant under the contract, to the same extent as if he was of full age and capacity at the time he entered into the contract or executed the mortgage or other instrument.

INDUSTRIAL ARBITRATION ACT 1912

6 "Worker" is defined as meaning any person not less than 14 years employed by ...etc.

179(1) (vii) The section gives power to make regulations for the registration of union workers under a prescribed age employed in any industry.

INSPECTION OF MACHINERY ACT 1921

15 (1) No young person under 14 years of age may be employed in working or assisting to work machinery.

(2) No male person under 18 years may be employed to clean machinery in motion.

(3) A person less than 18 years of age may not be in charge of a boiler.

LAND ACT 1933

26 No person under 16 years is eligible to select, acquire by transfer, or hold land under the Land Act, except in the case of land disposed of under Part IV (Town and Suburban Land).

LIQUOR ACT 1970

7 For the purposes of the Act 'juvenile' means a person under the age of 18 years.

69(4) (a) It must be a term of every club licence that a person who is a 'juvenile' cannot be elected honorary member of the club, unless the court approves.

(c) A 'juvenile' cannot be employed by a club except in clerical or administrative work.

LOCAL COURTS ACT 1904

57 A minor able the age of 18 years may sue or be sued without a next friend or guardian, as if he were of the full age of 21 years.

MARRIED PERSONS & CHILDREN (SUMMARY RELIEF) ACT 1965

The Act provides for the making of maintenance orders in respect of 'dependants'.

5 "Dependant" is defined as meaning, inter alia, one who is under the age of 18 years.

MENTAL HEALTH ACT 1962

27(1) A person may be admitted to an approved mental hospital:

(a) if under 18 years on the request of one of his parents or of his guardian;

(b) if not less than 18 years, on his own request, provided the superintendent is of the opinion that he is able to understand the nature and effect of his request.

51(1) & (2) A patient having a status under Division I of the Act (which refers to patients admitted informally) must be discharged within 72 hours after the patient or, in the case of a patient under the age of 18 years, the parent or guardian at whose request the patient was admitted applies for his discharge.

79 For the purposes of the Act, a person under the age of 18 years, who is suffering from a mental disorder necessitating treatment in his own or the public interest, and is not receiving treatment, is a 'neglected child' within the meaning of the Child Welfare Act 1947.

MINES REGULATION ACT 1946

41(2) Except in the case of a cadet or apprentice who is gaining the required experience as training for a profession or trade, a boy under the age of 16 years may not be employed underground.

PAWNBROKERS ACT 1860

26 A pawnbroker who purchases or takes in pledge any article from a person apparently under the age of 18 years commits an offence.

POISONS ACT 1964

34(1) The sale of prescribed poisons to persons apparently under the age of 18 years is prohibited unless accompanied by an adult known to both parties.

PRISONS ACT 1903

64B The section gives power to the Governor to direct that persons apparently of the age of 18 years or upwards are transferred from gaol to a reformatory prison.

PUBLIC SERVICE ACT 1904

29 (1) The age of new appointees to the clerical division cannot be less than 15 years at the last birthday previous to the appointment.

(2) The age of new appointees to the general division cannot be less than 14 years at the last birthday previous to the appointment.

RULES OF THE SUPREME COURT 1971

r.3(7) & (8)

(c) (iv) In non-probate actions, in the case of an infant who has attained the age of 14 years, amongst the documents that have to be filed before a person can act as a next friend or guardian ad litem, there must be filed a consent by the infant to that person acting as such.

r.4(3) (c) In probate actions, in the case of an infant who has attained the age of 16 years, a person may act as next friend or guardian ad litem without an order of the court where there is no testamentary or statutory guardian and the proposed next friend or guardian is a next of kin or spouse and has been appointed by the infant.

r.13(3) Where the infant has no next friend or guardian ad litem, personal service may be effect on him if he is aged 18 years or upwards; if he is not, then on a parent, guardian or the person with whom he resides or in whose care he is.

SPEAR GUNS CONTROL ACT 1955

4(1) (k) of the TABLE.

It is an offence for a person under 14 years of age to use a spear-gun otherwise than under the supervision of a person who has attained the age of 21 years.

SUPERANNUATION AND FAMILY BENEFITS ACT 1938

TRADE UNIONS ACT 1902

23 A member of a registered trade union who is not under the age of 16 years may, by writing under his hand, nominate a person to whom, in the event of the members' death, monies due to him may be paid.

TRAFFIC ACT 1919

23(2) (a) The minimum age for licensing a driver is 17 years, unless the Commissoner of Police considers that a denial of the licence will cause undue hardship;

(b) If under 18, consent of a parent in writing is necessary before a licence can be granted.

WELFARE AND ASSISTANCE ACT 1961

4 "Child" is defined as meaning a person under the age of 18 years.

11 Paragraph (a) of that section makes 'the adult children' of a person liable to pay or contribute towards the funeral expenses incurred in respect of the burial of the person.

(It is not clear whether 'adult child' in this section means a child over 21 years, as per the general law, or a child over 18, if the definition in section 4 above is given weight.)

WESTERN AUSTRALIAN MARINE ACT 1948

17 (Va) The Governor has power to make regulations prescribing the records that are to be kept concerning all persons under the age of 16 years employed on harbour and river ships.

114 (1) A seaman is not entitled to the rating A.B. unless he is, amongst other things, 18 years of age;

(2) A seaman is not entitled to the rating O.S. (ordinary seaman) unless he is 17 years of age or, with the approval of the Shipping Master, 16 years of age.

115 (1) The minimum age for any employment at sea is 15 years.

(2) The minimum age for employment in the stokehold of a steamer in the capacity of a fireman or a trimmer is 20 years.

116 No person under the age of 18 years may be engaged for service at sea in any capacity unless he is certified by a medical practitioner as being physically fit for service at sea in that capacity.

WILLS ACT 1970

7 Subject to provisions of Part VI of the Act, a will made by a person under the age of 18 years is not valid.

WORKERS' COMPENSATION ACT 1912

7 & First Schedule - (1) (a)

Where death results from an injury which justifies compensation under the Act, a specified sum is made payable by the Act in respect of each dependent child or step-child of the deceased worker who is under the age of 16 years.

YOUTH SERVICE ACT 1964

3 "Young person" is defined as meaning a person over the age of 13 and under the age of 25 years.

APPRENTICESHIP REGULATIONS 1964

2 Definition of 'minor': a person not less than 14 and not more than 18 years.

3	No 'minor' may be employed as an apprentice except under prescribed conditions.

Perpetuation of Testimony Act 1842 (Imp)

An Act for perpetuating Testimony in certain Cases. [3]

Preamble

Whereas it is expedient to extend the means of perpetuating testimony in certain cases:

Be it enacted by the Queen's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same,

[1.] Bills in Chancery to perpetuate testimony may be filed by persons claiming honours, titles, etc., contingent on future events

[T]hat any person who would, under the circumstances alleged by him to exist, become entitled, upon the happening of any future event, to any honour, title, dignity, or office, or to any estate or interest in any property, real or personal, the right or claim to which cannot by him be brought to trial before the happening of such event, shall be entitled, from and after the passing of this Act, to file a bill in the High Court of Chancery to perpetuate any testimony which may be material for establishing such claim or right; and that all laws, rules, and regulations not contrary to the provisions of this Act, now in force or in use in suits to perpetuate testimony, or respecting depositions taken in such suits, or the punishment of perjury committed in making such depositions, shall be in force and used and applied in all suits to be instituted under the authority of this Act, and in respect to depositions taken on such suits.

2. Attorney General to be party defendant in all such suits in which the Queen may have any estate or interest

And be it further enacted, that in all suits which may be so instituted under the authority of this Act, touching any honour, title, dignity, or office, or any other matter or thing, in which Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, may have any estate or interest, it shall be lawful to make the Attorney General for the time being a party defendant thereto; and that in all proceedings in which the depositions taken in any such suit in which the Attorney General for the time being was so made a defendant may be offered in evidence, such depositions may be admissible notwithstanding any objection to such depositions upon the ground that Her Majesty, her heirs or successors, were not parties to the suit in which such depositions were taken.

SELF-OWNERSHIP AND DESPOTISM: LOCKE ON PROPERTY IN THE PERSON, DIVINE DOMINIUM OF HUMAN LIFE, AND RIGHTS-FORFEITURE*

By Johan Olsthoorn

Abstract: This essay explores the meaning and normative significance of Locke's depiction of individuals as proprietors of their own person. I begin by reconsidering the long-standing puzzle concerning Locke's simultaneous endorsement of divine proprietorship and self-ownership. Befuddlement vanishes, I contend, once we reject concurrent ownership in the same object: while God fully owns our lives, humans are initially sole proprietors of their own person. (Our property rights in our life and body are restricted to possession, use, and usufruct.) Locke employs two conceptions of "personhood": as expressing legal independence vis-à-vis humans and moral accountability vis-à-vis God. Humans own their person in the first sense. As original proprietors of their own person, individuals are entitled to subject themselves to self-chosen authorities, thereby incurring obligations of obedience. But they may not choose just any authority. Divine ownership of human life delimits personal self-ownership by restricting the ways in which humans can dispose of their persons: we cannot possibly consensually subject ourselves to absolute and arbitrary power. Locke's rights-forfeiture theory for crime makes slavery and despotism nonetheless potentially rightful conditions. I argue that, paradoxically, divine dominium of human life underpins both the impermissibility of voluntary enslavement and the justifiability of penal slavery. My analysis helps explain why modern Lockean theories of self-ownership that reject Locke's theological premises have adopted an ambiguous stance toward despotic rule.

I. Introduction

John Locke (1632-1704) is commonly regarded as the token proponent, if not the originator, of "self-ownership"—the idea that humans have pre-institutional property rights in their person and the products of their labor.[1] Indeed, Locke gave a hallmark statement of this view: "every Man has a Property in his own Person. This no Body has any Right to but himself. The Labour of his Body, and the Work of his Hands, we may say, are properly his" (ST §27).[2] Incontrovertible as this passage seems, whether and to what extent Locke endorses the self-ownership thesis remains disputed. As is often noted, Locke appears to limit, if not undermine, the case for self-ownership by unreservedly embracing divine proprietorship of human life. All human beings are "the Servants of one Sovereign Master, sent into the World by his order and about his business, they are his Property, whose Workmanship they are" (ST §6). God's ownership rights in us restrict our autonomy: they generate a duty to preserve ourselves and rule out agreement to certain forms of political subjection. How to reconcile divine dominium by dint of creation with the idea that each human is by nature "Master of himself, and Proprietor of his own Person" (ST §44)?

A sizable literature has sprung up debating how, if at all, the two ownership claims can be reconciled. The apparent contradiction disappears, this essay argues, once we stop conflating property in our person with property in our lives. In the very paragraph where suicide is prohibited by appeal to divine workmanship, Locke contradistinguishes "disposing of one's person" with "destroying oneself." "But though this be a State of Liberty, yet it is not a State of Licence, though Man in that State have an uncontroleable Liberty, to dispose of his Person or Possessions, yet he has not Liberty to destroy himself" (ST §6). Lockean individuals, I contend, have original full ownership rights in their person but not in their lives and bodies. A few other scholars have made this point before.[3] This essay advances on their leads by examining what the absolute freedom to dispose of one's person and possessions means, and how personal self-ownership relates to divine ownership of human life.

Locke's conception of personhood is inspired, I suggest, by Roman law categories, partly due to the dynamics of responding to Robert Filmer. Full original ownership of our person means, first and foremost, that we are all born free—sui iuris, our own master. All forms of personal subjection are the consequence of human actions (engaging in commitments or crime). To dispose of one's person is to conditionally subject oneself to another, who henceforth acquires authority over one (that is, obtains a right over one's person, correlating in obligations of obedience). For Locke, initial full self-ownership thus expresses absolute original independence from human authority as well as rights of civil and political self-determination. It is not expressive of unlimited rights in our life or body—the ultimate owner of which is God.[4]

These qualifications might seem peripheral to modern Lockean theories of self-ownership. My quibbles exclusively concern Lockean rights in one's life and person, not rights to external resources. I will not here dispute that Lockean persons have full and exclusive rights in their labor and the products of their labor—doctrines central to libertarian theories of property. Yet given persistent concerns about the indeterminacy of the concept of self-ownership,[5] it is worthwhile to consider anew the question of what exactly people own when they own themselves.[6] This essay reveals that for Locke, self-ownership has a narrower and more definite meaning than is commonly supposed.

Locke's conception of personal self-ownership raises a question of enduring theoretical significance. Self-ownership is standardly substantiated as a set of property rights people have in their bodies or persons. Full liberal ownership includes the power to rent, sell, and mortgage the thing owned. Does this mean that humans qua self-owners are free to sell themselves into slavery and bonded labor? Proponents of self-ownership can forestall this illiberal outcome by arguing that self-enslavement is either impossible or morally impermissible.[7] How easily the impossibility of self-enslavement can be established depends on what we assume the object of self-ownership to be. If, for instance, we take the alienable thing to be ourselves—dignified human beings—then the sale in a sense destroys the thing. Running some such line of argument is more difficult if, like Locke, we hold that self-owners own their person and understand personal self-subjection as agreeing to be governed by another. Why would self-enslavement be impossible, while agreement to be ruled by a boss or politician is not? This essay argues that Locke invoked a premise external to self-ownership to establish the impossibility of voluntary subjection to despotic government—divine dominium of human life. This helps explain why modern Lockean theories of self-ownership that reject Locke's theological premises have dithered about the legitimacy of self-enslavement.

[4] I will treat "self-ownership" and "property in the person" as interchangeable and expressing original ownership/proprietorship of one's person (rather than one's life). Carole Pateman insists that the two concepts ought to be kept distinct. In her view, "self-ownership" trades on the "political fiction" that labor power is an alienable commodity, while "property in the person" renders salient the relations of power and subordination involved in labor contracts. For Locke, however, any right that individuals have in virtue of owning a thing is in principle alienable. [7] On this distinction, see Danny Frederick, "The Possibility of Contractual Slavery," The Philosophical Quarterly 66, no. 262 (2016): 47–64.

The essay unfolds as follows. After dissecting the current debate on the compatibility of self-ownership and divine proprietorship (Section II) and developing a rival interpretation (Section III), I will argue that divine proprietorship curtails individual rights to dispose of one's person. Divine dominium grounds individual rights and duties of self-preservation. We must preserve ourselves and the rest of humanity on pain of violating God's ownership rights in human life; the joint duties of others correlate in my individual rights to life and bodily integrity. Duties of self-preservation underpin Locke's argument for the impossibility of both self-enslavement and the consensual establishment of absolute and arbitrary government. Both kinds of rule presuppose forms of personal subjection incompatible with God's dominium. Divine proprietorship of human life thus delimits original self-ownership in one's person: humans lack full moral control over which relations of personal subjection they can enter (Section IV). Section V explores Locke's theory of rights-forfeiture. Locke combines robust claims about natural rights in our own person with unsettlingly permissive views about capital punishment and penal enslavement—raising a range of questions about the theoretical coherence of his political commitments. I argue that divine proprietorship is the lynchpin between self-ownership and rights-forfeiture. As the owner of our lives, God has the moral power to authorize humans to be killed and enslaved for crime. Divine dominium thus both explains the impossibility of self-enslavement and the justifiability of penal slavery. I conclude with some reflections on the logical connections between self-ownership and voluntary slavery.

II. Divine Proprietorship versus Human Self-Ownership

Every human being, Locke writes, is by nature "Master of himself, and Proprietor of his own Person, and the Actions or Labour of it" (ST §44). At the same time, he is adamant that "Men being all the Workmanship of one Omnipotent, and infinitely wise Maker . . . they are his Property, whose Workmanship they are" (ST §6). How, if at all, can self-ownership and divine proprietorship be reconciled?

Some scholars regard the two positions as "clearly incompatible."[8] For while God's dominium renders suicide impermissible, self-owners putatively have the right to kill themselves. This tension leads Michael Zuckert to posit a "shift to self-ownership from divine proprietorship" in the Second Treatise—a "stunning reversal."[9] His argument hinges on a moot reading of Locke's claim that a slave who has forfeited his life may "draw on himself the Death he desires" by resisting his master's will (ST §23). Zuckert glosses this passage as saying that slaves have a right to commit suicide indirectly. That would prove that Locke eventually "settles the question definitively in favour of self-ownership"—"the true grounds of his natural law . . . doctrine."[10] Whatever the merits of Zuckert's Straussian reading, his contention is undermined by Locke's invocation of "the Workmanship of their own Maker, the Almighty" later on (ST §56), as well as by the central role divine ownership of human life plays in Locke's main argument for the impossibility of consensually establishing arbitrary government (Section IV).

A popular harmonizing solution holds that God and humans have different kinds of rights in the same thing. Humans are entrusted with rights of use and usufruct in their life, while God retains ultimate ownership and thus the right to reclaim our lives. Brian Tierney, for instances, avers that the two ownership theses are "not contradictory" since humans own themselves "as a sort of trust from God."[11] "[W]e are not absolute and outright owners of ourselves; the only being who owns us in that way is God," Alan Ryan writes, adding that "we have something like a lease in ourselves."[12] All natural rights, Jennifer Welchman claims, "accrue from God's grant or concession to us of our lives, our bodies, and our world."[13] Self-owners would thus like tenants hold "the right to the use and the fruits of another person's property, with the duty to preserve its substance."[14]

In a series of recent publications Adam Seagrave has rejected this popular reconciliatory strategy. He concedes that God has entrusted humans with liberty-rights to use the world and its resources: "in respect of God the Maker of Heaven and Earth, who is sole Lord and Proprietor of the whole World, Man's Propriety in the Creatures is nothing but that Liberty to use them, which God has permitted" (FT §39). Yet Locke nowhere says that our rights in our person are limited to use alone. On the contrary, individuals are depicted in such a way that each is the "absolute Lord of his own Person and Possessions, equal to the greatest, and subject to no Body," free to dispose of his person as he wishes (ST §123). For this reason,

Seagrave maintains, we must dismiss the so-called "tenant" interpretation of human ownership.[15]

Seagrave's alternative solution invokes a distinction from the ECHU. Individuals would have a twofold structure: they can be viewed under the aspect of "substance-man" and of "person-self." "While God makes and owns the individual considered as a 'substance-man' the individual considered as a 'person-self' makes and owns herself."[16] On Seagrave's reading, humans literally make their own person and actions by "appropriating, extending, and joining activity or 'labor' of consciousness."[17] Just as God begets ownership by creating "substance-man," so do we come to own ourselves by creating our own person and actions. God has created humans "as potential self-owners."[18] Like proponents of the tenant interpretation, Seagrave holds that God and humans have property rights in the self-same object. But he departs from that interpretation by insisting that the "property which the human being possesses in himself is identical in kind with the property which God possesses in the human being."[19] It is not a lesser property right, like use or usufruct.[20] In Seagrave's view, full human self-ownership is compatible with, because nested within, full divine proprietorship.

Common to all these readings, and indeed the source of the conundrum, is the supposition of "the coexistence of Divine and human ownership or property with respect to the same object."[21] This assumption of concurrent ownership in the self-same subject, I argue, must be rejected. The next section develops Jeremy Waldron's and James Tully's suggestion that humans are the sole owners of their person, while God owns their lives. "God is the proprietor of man because . . . God makes man. Man on the other hand . . . is the proprietor of his person and . . . of the actions of his person."[22] If my proposal is sound, then the rival tenant and nested interpretations are each half-right and half-wrong—albeit in obverse ways. Our rights in our life are limited to possession, use, and usufruct, as the tenant interpretation correctly implies.[23] But we initially have full rights in our person, as Seagrave accurately observes. To establish the meaning and coherence of this suggestion, the next section explores different senses of personhood across Locke's corpus.

III. The Meaning of "Person"

The idea that all human life belongs to God in virtue of His creation is a cornerstone of Locke's moral and political theory. "An All-wise Contriver," we read in the First Treatise, "has so visible a claim on us as his Workmanship" (FT §53; cf. FT §30). Already in the Essays on the Law of Nature (c. 1663-64) Locke had averred that creation gives God authority over us. "God has created us out of nothing and, if he pleases, he will reduce us again to nothing: we are, therefore, subject to him in perfect justice and by utmost necessity" (ELN 119). However, Locke did not yet endorse divine ownership of human life in the Essays. Rather, creation endows God with a general right to govern us:

> God . . . has such authority and power over us as we cannot exercise over ourselves, and since we owe our body, soul, and life—whatever we are, whatever we have, and even whatever we can be—to him and to him alone, it is proper that we should live according to the precept of his will. (ELN 119)

This argument differs substantively from that found in the Second Treatise. God's "right of creation" (ELN 117) is compatible with us merely having a duty of gratitude to serve Him. The Essays do not argue that humans must preserve themselves and the rest of humanity on pain of violating God's ownership rights in their lives (Section IV). Duties of self-preservation are rather established by God's will and discovered by teleological reflection on the human predicament. Nor do the Essays distinguish between life and person.

That distinction is present in An Essay Concerning Human Understanding (1689). That text reiterates the idea that "God has given a Rule whereby Men should govern themselves" (that is, natural law). For "He has a Right to do it, we are his Creatures," and the power to enforce his commands: "for no body can take us out of his hands" (ECHU 2.28.8). Locke again claims God's existence is demonstrated by the signs of design seen everywhere (ECHU 1.4.9, 4.10). And he again calls us God's "Workmanship" (ECHU 4.10.18).

[23] Tully, A Discourse on Property, 114: "Locke is . . . not inconsistent in saying that man's life is both God's and man's property . . . It belongs to both, but in different ways: man's property is the right to use and preserve what is essentially God's property, similar to a tenant's property" (emphasis added).

https://doi.org/10.1017/S0265052519000438 Published online by Cambridge University Press

New to ECHU is a lengthy discussion of the distinct meanings of "person," "substance," and "man" in the context of the metaphysics of personal identity (ECHU 2.27.7). Human beings are made up of two substances: matter and finite intelligence (ECHU 2.27.2). The term "man" denotes a "corporeal rational Creature" of humanlike shape (ECHU 3.11.16). The conceptual possibility of transmigration of souls proves the ideas of "sameness of soul" and "sameness of man" dissimilar. For if Heliogabalus's soul would reincarnate in a pig, few "would yet say that Hog were a Man or Heliogabalus" (ECHU 2.27.6). A person "is a thinking intelligent Being, that has reason and reflection, and can consider it self as it self, the same thinking thing in different times." Personal identity is thus "the sameness of a rational Being" over time (ECHU 2.27.9).

Driving Locke's account of personal identity is the justification of otherworldly rewards and punishments (ECHU 2.27.18). Divine justice requires that we still be the same persons on the Great Day of Reckoning as we are now. This theological desideratum informs Locke's analysis of "person": "it is a Forensick Term appropriating Actions and their Merit; and so belongs only to intelligent Agents capable of a Law, and Happiness and Misery" (ECHU 2.27.26). Persons are conscious selves to whom actions can be ascribed and for which that self can be held accountable. Linking personal identity to continuity in "substance" or "man" will not do since bodies change and people die. Our souls might be in a disembodied state on the Day of Judgment or incarnated in even-toed ungulates. Personal identity persists even as the substances composing us change (as happens upon death) (ECHU 2.27.11). What rather preserves personal identity over time, Locke argues, is consciousness. "The same consciousness uniting those distant Actions into the same Person, whatever Substances contributed to their Production" (ECHU 2.27.10). Moral accountability toward God, after all, presupposes awareness of past deeds.

Accountability is explained in terms of "owning" one's actions. "This personality extends it self beyond present Existence to what is past, only by consciousness, whereby it becomes concerned and accountable, owns and imputes to it self past Actions" (ECHU 2.27.26). "Persons" are thus foremost stable moral ascription points capable of giving account of their actions after their bodily demise. One acute observer has concluded that "Locke's idea of moral man appears, then, to be related to the legal idea of person, of 'a subject of legal rights and duties'."[24] We could indeed say that Locke moralizes the legal notion of personhood to capture relations of accountability toward God. Our person, in this sense, is evidently nonidentical to our life. God can rightly wipe away our life in a blink without affecting our personhood, which persists, keeping us answerable for our every deed.

Tully has argued that Locke's exposition of person found in ECHU is key to understanding the idea of self-proprietorship in the Two Treatises.[25] Personhood requires the capacity of free and intentional action. Just as God holds "makers' rights" in his creation, so each human "comes to have a natural and exclusive right in the actions he makes as a person."[26] I will here leave undiscussed Tully's "maker's rights"-interpretation of the foundations of Lockean property rights.[27] Instead, I will criticize Tully's suggestion that Locke has a single conception of 'person," found in both ECHU and the Two Treatises. Locke in fact uses the term "person" in two irreducibly distinct senses, both nonidentical with life. "Person" either denotes: 1) a morally accountable self—the "moral man"; or 2) "what is owned by that individual—his moral property."[28] Call them "moral" and "legal" personhood for short. Moral personhood, a presupposition of moral accountability, is prevalent in the ECHU. The legal meaning of personhood is salient in the Two Treatises.

Each human being is born, Locke writes, with "A Right of Freedom to his Person, which no other Man has a Power over, but the free Disposal of it lies in himself" (ST §190). For Locke, the power to dispose (ius alieni) is essential to property. Things must be "their own, and at their own dispose, and not at his; or else it is no property" (ST §194).[29] How can an individual simultaneously be a person and be a proprietor of his person if ownership essentially includes rights of disposal? These statements are highly puzzling if, following Tully, we identify the freely acting moral agent with the person she owns.[30] For Locke would then be claiming that self-owners have a power to freely dispose of their selves. That would contradict both the prohibition against suicide and the persistence of personal identity in the hereafter. What then does the absolute original right in one's person and the "uncontroleable Liberty, to dispose of his Person" mean (ST §6)? What is being disposed when one disposes of one's person?

To answer these questions, we must turn to Locke's polemics with Filmer. Filmer rejected the axiom of human natural freedom underlying the social contract of government. We are all born in subjection, owing lifelong obedience to our fathers from birth. The right to rule, he argued, is nothing other than the absolute and arbitrary right that fathers putatively have over their offspring. The biblical donation of dominium over nonhuman animals was interpreted by Filmer as proof that Adam had "by right of fatherhood, royal authority over his children."[31] This right, "as large and as ample as the absolutest dominion of any monarch," had subsequently been passed on to successor patriarch kings.[32] Filmer thus treated all authority as identical in kind. Kingly power simply is fatherly power. Indeed, "a son, a subject, and a servant or a slave, were one and the same thing at first."[33] Moreover, all rule is essentially despotic, arbitrary, and absolute: no subject is accorded the advantage of private property—not even in his own person.

Locke balked at this. He chided Filmer for granting to rulers > a Divine unalterable Right of Sovereignty, whereby a Father or a Prince hath an Absolute, Arbitrary, Unlimited, and Unlimitable Power, over the Lives, Liberties, and Estates of his Children and Subjects; so that he may take or alienate their Estates, sell, castrate, or use their Persons as he pleases, they being all his Slaves, and he Lord or Proprietor of every Thing, and his unbounded Will their Law. (FT §9)

Locke concurred that parental rule is "a natural Government" but dismissed Filmer's equation of paternal with political rule (ST §170). Locke was adamant that everyone equally is born free from political authority. "Man being born . . . with a Title to perfect Freedom, and an uncontrouled enjoyment of all the Rights and Priviledges of the Law of Nature, equally with any other Man" (ST §87). Children are subject to the natural government of their parents, entailing natural obligations of obedience.[34] But, Locke insisted, once anyone comes of age, "then he is a Free-man, at liberty what Government he will put himself under; what Body Politick he will unite himself to" (ST §118; also, ST §57). Original property in one's person is thus expressive of human natural freedom from civil subjection. All forms of civil subordination are the consequence of individual actions (engaging in commitments or crime).

What does the liberty to freely dispose of one's person mean? Out of sociable inclinations and to avoid the dangers inseparable from life without civil government each individual voluntarily chooses to "unite his Person, which was before free, to any Commonwealth; by the same he unites his Possessions, which were before free, to it also; and they become, both of them, Person and Possession, subject to the Government and Dominion of that Commonwealth" (ST §120). The natural freedom of each to dispose his person and possessions as he wishes is, then, no admonishment to suicide but simply the right to choose one's own political rulers and masters (and an immunity against anyone else imposing a master upon one). All civil authority originates in the consent of self-owners.[35] Personal self-ownership thus both presupposes original freedom from civil subjection and uniquely entitles individuals to consensually enter such conditions of subjection. Freely disposing of one's person does not involve alienating or extinguishing one's legal personhood. Rather, it is the free acceptance of personal subjection to some self-chosen authority (in marriage, employment, or politics), who in turn acquires a right to govern one's person.

[34] Cf. ST §55: "Children, I confess are not born in this full state of Equality, though they are born to it" (emphasis added). Following Grotius, Locke challenged Filmer's contention that children never become independent from their living fathers (ST §§55-67). James Tyrrell did the same in Patriarcha non Monarcha (London: Richard Janeway, 1681), 18-19. Hugo Grotius, The Rights of War and Peace, Volumes 1-3, ed. Richard Tuck (Indianapolis, IN: Liberty Fund, 2005), 2.5.2.1.

In claiming that individuals are initially proprietors of their own person Locke advances what has been called a "proprietary" conception of rights.[36] The idea that every person stands "in a relation of dominium to his own dominium," that is, "has property in his rights" and can hence sell and otherwise alienate them, was a scholastic commonplace.[37] Observe, though, that Lockean individuals do not fully renounce their person and possessions upon entering political society.[38] That would defeat the purpose of civil subjection, which is "the mutual Preservation of their Lives, Liberties and Estates, which I call by the general Name, Property" (ST §123; also, ST §138). Rather, humans place their person and property under civil jurisdiction, to be regulated by laws for the common good (ST §50). Such regulation will involve taxation and other restrictions of individual liberties and property rights, justified by the need to secure the rights of all.

Political rulers hence do not come to own the persons of their subjects. They rather acquire a directive power over these persons, correlating in citizens' obligations of obedience. Operative here is Aristotle's distinction in Politics (1255b16-20) between the political government of a statesman (politikos) over free and equal persons and the domestic rule of the master (despotes) over slaves.[39] Following Aristotle, Locke characterized political rule as the power of "Governours" who govern by public consent and "for the Benefit of their Subjects, to secure them in the Possession and Use of their Properties" (ST §173). Power is properly called "political" only because and insofar as it serves to "preserve the Members of that Society in their Lives, Liberties, and Possessions" (ST §171). Despotic power, conversely, is the power of "Lords" who rule "for their own Benefit, over those who are Stripp'd of all property"—"which Men have in their Persons as well as Goods" (ST §173). Despotic and political power are fundamentally distinct in origin and character. Political rule is not the rule of the dominus. Indeed, "Absolute Monarchy… can be no Form of Civil Government at all" (ST §90; also, ST §174).

Lockean slaves have lost their legal personality entirely and hence lack any legal standing, as in Roman law.[40] Lacking all rights and property, even in their persons, they may be killed at will. Locke defines "Despotical Power"—the power of a master over her slave—as "an Absolute Power one Man has over another, to take away his Life, whenever he pleases" (ST §172). Despotic power can justly be acquired only over someone who has "by his fault, forfeited his own Life, by some Act that deserves Death" (ST §23). Since slaves are "not capable of any Property," they therefore "cannot in that state be considered as any part of Civil Society; the chief end whereof is the preservation of Property" (ST §85). Section V further explores Locke's justification of penal slavery.

When Locke claims that slaves have no legal standing, his point is not that they need not worry about Doomsday. Slaves are not absolved of giving moral account of themselves for having lost legal personality. The same holds for minors and married women (insofar as they would lack legal personality). Personhood vis-à-vis God is independent from being legally sui juris. But don't our persons belong to God? Recall my distinction between moral and legal personhood. In neither sense, I contend, does God own our persons. He certainly has the right to rule us; our persons are under divine jurisdiction. That government expresses itself in accountability to him for the moral quality of our actions. Now, God cannot coherently own our "moral person" and hold us accountable for our moral conduct. For being a moral person just is being held subject to the moral law. Neither can God freely dispose of our legal personhood. Humans are entitled to freely and voluntarily limit their independence by agreeing to submit to the power (potestas) of another: a political ruler, boss, or husband (Locke maintains). God clearly cannot marry me off or subject me to some political regime. God has the right and power to sanction compliance with moral law with threats of otherworldly bliss or doom. He also has another lawful power: to reclaim our present lives at will. We have no standing to complain to God for not being given a longer sojourn in this vale of tears. Yet God has this latter power in virtue of owning our lives, rather than our persons.[41]

Original proprietorship of our person and divine ownership of human life are compatible, I have argued, because the former by no means captures all the rights humans can have in themselves. It merely expresses an original right of self-government and natural freedom from civil subjection. The next section explores what implications divine ownership of human life has for personal self-ownership.

IV. How Divine Dominium Delimits Lawful Personal Subjection

Divine ownership of human life is the mainstay of Locke's moral and political theory. It grounds, first, the natural law duty to preserve oneself and the rest of humanity. The "Fundamental Law of Nature and Government" dictates that "all the Members of the Society are to be preserved" on pain of transgressing God's property rights (ST §159).[42] The duty to preserve ourselves is a direct corollary of Locke's restriction of property rights in our life to exclusive possession, use, and usufruct. These rights hence fall short of full ownership, which is captured by the trivium usus, usufructus, abusus. Since our life is not ours, "no Body has an Absolute Arbitrary Power over himself, or over any other, to destroy his own Life, or take away the Life or Property of Another" (ST §135). Murder and suicide are impermissible because they violate God's ownership rights in our lives.

Second, divine ownership generates rights of self-preservation and self-defense: "they will always have a right to preserve what they have not a Power to part with; and to rid themselves of those who invade this Fundamental, Sacred, and unalterable Law of Self-Preservation" (ST §149). Individual claim-rights to life and limb are the correlates of the general duty not to impair God's property without His permission. "To have rights against other human beings, rights understood as derivative from the primary natural law duties, means to be the beneficiary of the others' natural law duties."[43] over their slaves, including a "power to kill him, at any time" (ST §24). It is impossible for Lockean individuals to voluntarily enter such forms of subjection:

A third major implication of divine ownership of human life is the impossibility of self-enslavement. Lockean slavery is an unusually vile condition.[44] Masters have an "Absolute, Arbitrary, Despotical Power"

[41] Brubaker, "Coming into One's Own," 217, deems it significant that Locke calls humans God's servants rather than his slaves (ST §6). For "servants own themselves, slaves do not." As evidence for the normative relation between humans and God, the point cannot be pushed too far. While masters have power of life and death over slaves but not over servants, God indisputably has the absolute power to take our life at will. Brubaker's point becomes obsolete once we recognize that God exercises the latter power in virtue of owning our lives.

> For a Man, not having the Power of his own Life, cannot, by Compact, or his own Consent, enslave himself to any one, nor put himself under the Absolute, Arbitrary Power of another, to take away his Life, when he pleases. No body can give more Power than he has himself; and he that cannot take away his own Life, cannot give another power over it. (ST §23)

The impossibility of self-enslavement extends to the consensual establishment of all despotic power, including absolute monarchy.

Fourth, divine dominium delimits which powers individuals can hand over to government. Killing or harming innocent fellow-humans violates God's ownership rights: we neither own our life, nor that of others. Citizens cannot authorize the government to harm innocent subjects since they lack this power themselves.

> A Man . . . cannot subject himself to the Arbitrary Power of another; and having in the State of Nature no Arbitrary Power over the Life, Liberty, or Possession of another, but only so much as the Law of Nature gave him for the preservation of himself, and the rest of Mankind; this is all he doth, or can give up to the Common-wealth, and by it to the Legislative Power, so that the Legislative can have no more than this. (ST §135)

This section analyzes the normative implications of divine proprietorship through the lens of the "life versus person" distinction. I argue that rights and duties of self-preservation restrict how we can dispose of our person, rendering certain pacts of subjection morally out of bounds. My argument, I should stress, concerns the possibility of disposing of our person, not our life/body. I have already established that Locke rejects full self-ownership of one's life. I will now argue that Locke also dismisses full original self-ownership of one's person.

To fully grasp the structure of Locke's theory of human and divine ownership, it helps to distinguish between two kinds of restrictions on property rights.[45] Some rights-delimitations are internal to property: the property rights we have in virtue of owning a thing are less extensive then they could logically be. Lockean rights in life are a case in point: we were never given full ownership of our life, including rights of destruction, to begin with. Other delimitations are external to property rights. External moral norms, informed by some moral value or another, can place limits on what we may do with our property. For instance, duties of care to dependents may render it morally impermissible for me to kill myself. The difference between internal and external restrictions is not the extent of our rights—these might be equally curtailed. The distinction rather concerns the source and nature of rights-restrictions. Consider: I might have no right to wreck the Cézanne painting I own because I bought it on condition that I will preserve it (internal restriction). The property rights I have acquired in the painting were, in that case, never so expansive as to include a right of destruction. Alternatively, wrecking the Cézanne might be morally impermissible because of its exceptional artistic value (external limitation). Internal restrictions determine the extent of our property rights—what we have moral title to in virtue of owning a thing. External limitations impose moral duties on conduct—what we are morally entitled to do with our property. These duties are external to property rights.

This distinction allows us to see that Locke argues, not for the moral impermissibility of instituting despotic rule, but for its impossibility. Consider this passage:

> it being out of a Man's power so to submit himself to another, as to give him a liberty to destroy him; God and Nature never allowing a Man so to abandon himself, as to neglect his own preservation: And since he cannot take away his own Life, neither can he give another power to take it (ST §168).

Locke makes two claims here: 1) we have a moral duty to preserve ourselves; 2) we cannot transfer to another the right to kill us since we ourselves lack this power. The first claim states that suicide is morally impermissible, not that it is somehow impossible. By contrast, granting another the right to kill us at will is not so much morally forbidden, as impossible. "[N]o Man can, by agreement, pass over to another that which he hath not in himself, a Power over his own Life" (ST §24).[46] Observe that Locke's "impossibility" thesis trades on the idea that divine ownership of human life creates an internal restriction on our property rights in our life. Locke's claim is not that natural law renders self-enslavement impermissible (external restriction). Rather, he maintains that the property rights in our life we have received were never so expansive as to include the ius alieni (right of transfer and destruction), rendering self-enslavement impossible (internal restriction).

[46] As the Roman law maxim has it, "no one can transfer to another a right which he himself does not possess" (Digest 50.17.54).

The political implications of Locke's prohibition of suicide are amply recognized in the literature.[47] The "life versus person" distinction allows for a sharper analysis of Locke's argument than is extant. Humans, I have suggested, have been given limited property rights in their life—possession, use, and usufruct. To intentionally destroy one's life or that of an innocent other violates God's ownership rights in all human life; for this reason, natural law commands us to preserve ourselves and the rest of humanity (as far as possible). Because we lack ultimate ownership of our lives, we cannot voluntarily enter conditions of absolute subjection. On the reading proposed here, humans have a natural right of disposal in their own person—each is by nature "absolute Lord of his own Person and Possessions" (ST §123). As personal self-owners, we can generally transfer the right to govern us to whomever and in whichever way we please— with one big exception: we cannot consent to despotic rule. Despotic rulers have the moral power, Locke avers, to kill their subjects at any time (ST §24). Voluntary subjection to despotism is impossible since it presupposes transference of a power of life and death that we lack.

Divine ownership of human life, I have argued, restricts what kinds of subjection humans can agree to. Just as it is impossible to alienate our rights to self-preservation and self-defense, so we cannot dispose of our persons in a way that amounts to relinquishing such rights to another.[48] For this reason, we can never formally place our persons under the jurisdiction of an absolute monarch, wielding the arbitrary power of life and death. Locke, I have contended, defends the impossibility, rather than the moral impermissibility, of instituting despotic rule. It follows that divine ownership of human life internally curbs our general right to freely dispose our persons as we wish. The rights we have in virtue of owning our persons are not as ample as full ownership rights.

V. Forfeiting Your Life: Capital Punishment and Penal Slavery

The Second Treatise contains a rather startling theory of rights-forfeiture (involuntary loss through wrongdoing). In the state of nature, anyone guilty of using unjust force becomes liable to be killed by anyone else. For the unjust aggressor forfeits his life. "'Tis the unjust use of force then, that puts a Man into the state of War with another, and thereby he, that is guilty of it, makes a forfeiture of his Life" (ST §181). More distressingly, unjust aggressors may lawfully be enslaved by the persons they have injured, to compensate for harm done. “Indeed having, by his fault, forfeited his own Life, by some Act that deserves Death; he, to whom he has forfeited it, may (when he has him in his Power) delay to take it, and make use of him to his own Service, and he does him no injury by it” (ST §23). How can Locke coherently endorse penal slavery while insisting that self-owners have a natural right of self-government?

Locke’s endorsement of a rights-forfeiture theory of crime raises many questions.[49] Some concern the very possibility of forfeiture. How does rights-forfeiture chime with divine ownership of human life and proprietorship of one’s person? How can we forfeit something—our life—that was never ours to begin with? And if we cannot directly alienate our life to someone else, how come we can act in such a way as to forfeit it to another? Others concern the normative consequences of forfeiture. What kind of rights do masters acquire in their slaves? And if all of us may kill unjust aggressors outside the commonwealth, why cannot we all permissibly enslave unjust aggressors as well?

This section contends that divine dominium of human life underpins the justifiability of penal slavery—just as it grounds the impossibility of self-enslavement. I argue that the law of nature authorizes each individual to punish by death anyone who has forfeited his life through unjust aggression. Yet only the injured party can claim the aggressor’s goods or service in compensation for harm done to her. If the injured party chooses to exercise this right and enslave the unjust aggressor, then she acquires “a Despotical Right over the Person” of the aggressor (ST §196). Despotic right includes the “Absolute, Arbitrary Power . . . to take away his Life, whenever he pleases” (ST §172). People can justly hold such arbitrary power only over individuals who had previously forfeited their life. Peculiarly, Locke conceives of the master-slave relation in just war terms: masters hold the power of life and death over their slaves by the right of war.

In the state of nature, “every Man hath a Right to punish the Offender, and be Executioner of the Law of Nature” (ST §8; also, ST §87; ST §128). Locke concedes that this may seem “a very strange Doctrine” to some (ST §9). Very few philosophers before Locke had endorsed a natural right to punish of any kind (Grotius being the main exception). The right to punish was standardly seen as presupposing political authority over the criminal. Granting any such right to mere individuals, equals by nature, was therefore deemed incoherent.[50] According to Locke, the natural law—which commands us to do our utmost to preserve ourselves and the rest of humanity—gives all and sundry "a right to punish the transgressors of that Law to such a Degree, as may hinder its Violation" (ST §7). This universal right to punish for the sake of deterrence is conditional on the aggressor's liability to be killed (ST §172). The right is not, however, constituted by or derived from the aggressor's forfeiture of his life.[51]

[49] Some of these questions are discussed in Jeremy Waldron, God, Locke, and Equality: Christian Foundations in Locke’s Political Thought (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2002), 143–50.

[50] For example, Francisco de Vitoria, Political Writings, ed. Anthony Pagden and Jeremy Lawrance (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991), 300; Alberico Gentili, De Jure Belli Libri Tres, Volumes 1-2, ed. John C. Rolfe (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1933), 41; Francisco Suárez, “A Work on the Three Theological Virtues: Faith, Hope and Charity,” in Selections from Three Works, Volumes 1-2, ed. Gwladys L. Williams, Ammi Brown, and John Waldron (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1944), 818. Cf. Grotius, The Rights of War and Peace, 2.20.9.

Locke, I suggest, was working with the received twin Roman law categories of rights in things and rights against persons. The two categories are mutually exclusive. Rights in things hold against the world (as legal theorists are wont to say): your privileged relation to the thing owned grounds obligations imposed on everyone else. By contrast, rights against persons are bilateral and grounded in the distinctive normative relation in which you and I stand. To forfeit a right in a thing (say, in your life) thus means forgoing standing against the world. Aggressors can consequently no longer claim to possess a right to life against anyone. This follows directly from the juridical shape property rights in things have. Conversely, forfeiting my personal right against you (say, that you keep your promise) has no normative consequences for third parties. Attesting to his endorsement of the pre-Hohfeldian idea of rights in things, Locke consistently speaks of forfeiting one's life—not of forfeiting one's right to life (correlating in obligations others owe you).[52] Unjust aggressors entirely forgo the limited property rights they had in their life.

By forgoing their lives, unjust aggressors also forgo their right of self-preservation. That right can be seen as the upshot of natural law duties of everyone else not to destroy God's property without His permission. We ought to preserve ourselves and humanity because it is wrong to destroy what belongs to another without their consent. The natural right to punish criminal offenders can be understood as a divine authorization to demolish God's property. By forfeiting their lives, unjust aggressors thus annul the natural law duties on everyone else not to destroy this part of God's creation.

The deterrence ("restraint") justification for rights of punishment does not sanction seizing possession of the person and goods of the aggressor.[53] While the right "of Punishing the Crime for restraint . . . is in every body," the right "of taking reparation . . . belongs only to the injured party" (ST §11).

The victim is uniquely entitled to seize the aggressor's goods and labor by right of self-preservation.[54]

> The damnified [that is, injured] Person has this Power of appropriating to himself, the Goods or Service of the Offender, by Right of Self-preservation, as every Man has a Power to punish the Crime, to prevent its being committed again, by the Right he has of Preserving all Mankind. (ST §11; also, ST §183)

How self-preservation exactly grounds rights of reparation is not entirely clear. Locke is not, I gather, making the Hobbesian claim that our preservation is better served by seeking recovery, but rather the Grotian one that violations of our rights entitle us to seek compensation for harm suffered.[55] Unlike Grotius, Locke maintains that one way to secure compensation is to enslave the culpable aggressor. The remedial right to enslave unjust aggressors requires that the latter are liable to greater punishments (ST §23). But the right is not grounded in their liability. Rather, self-preservation entitles individuals to seek compensation for unjustly suffered harm. Locke reiterates the same point in his discussion of just conquest. Any victim of unjust aggression "by Conquest has a right over a Man's Person to destroy him if he pleases," but "has not thereby a right over his Estate to possess and enjoy it." For only "damage sustain'd . . . gives him Title to another Mans Goods . . . His force, and the state of War he put himself in, made him forfeit his Life, but gave me no Title to his Goods" (ST §182; also, ST §180).

This last passage could be read as evidence that Locke's "bestialization of offenders" should not be taken literally.[56] While unjust aggressors "may be destroyed as . . . one of those wild Savage Beasts, with whom Men can have no Society nor Security" (ST §11), such "animals" do not lose all rights, it seems—only the right to life. The evidence is not decisive. That the victim does not acquire rights in the aggressor's estates does not mean that the aggressor retains those rights. Locke mentions rights of dependents immediately after: "My wife had a share in my Estate, that neither could I forfeit. And my Children also, being born of me, had a right to be maintained out of my Labour or Substance" (ST §183). The aggressor might thus well have forfeited all his rights, though not those of his family.

The bestialization reading is bolstered by Locke's claim that despotic power is "over such as have no property at all" (ST §174; also, ST §85).

[54] Welchman overlooks this distinction in "Locke on Slavery and Inalienable Rights," 78–79. Locke justifies penal slavery for reasons of compensation—not deterrence, as Welchman avers.

Locke advances a just war conception of slavery. The "perfect condition of Slavery . . . is nothing else, but the State of War continued, between a lawful Conqueror, and a Captive" (ST §24). The relations between master and slave are governed not by civil law or private contract but by ius belli: "as soon as Compact enters, Slavery ceases, and he so far quits his Absolute Power, and puts an end to the State of War, who enters into Conditions with his Captive" (ST §173). Locke's bellicose conception of slavery might suggest that the master has no governmental power over her slaves whatsoever. Master and slave simply occupy a state of war. The inference is premised on a false dichotomy. Locke's view is that despotic rule consists in rights of war over the persons of unjust aggressors.[57]

Despotic power is a potentially lawful rule over persons (ST §196). It differs essentially from political rule in including the arbitrary power of life and death—a right that can only be acquired by just war. The inability of humans to consent to despotic power does not render it altogether illegitimate. For while humans cannot alienate or renounce their life (never theirs to begin with), they can forfeit it for crime.

> Despotical Power is an Absolute, Arbitrary Power one Man has over another, to take away his Life, whenever he pleases. This is a Power, which neither Nature gives . . . nor Compact can convey, for Man not having such an Arbitrary Power over his own Life, cannot given another Man such a Power over it; but it is the effect only of Forfeiture, which the Aggressor makes of his own Life, when he puts himself into the state of War with another. (ST §172)[58]

While everyone may kill liable offenders in deterrence, not everyone thereby acquires a right to their personal service. The right to hold the offender in personal subjection accrues only to the just conqueror, "to whom" the criminal has forfeited his life in compensation for harm suffered (ST §23).

My analysis of Locke's rights-forfeiture theory has further elucidated the logical entanglements between divine ownership of human life and self-ownership of one's person. Lockean self-owners are free to subject themselves to whatever civil government they choose—provided such government is compatible with the limited powers they have over their lives. Just conquerors can acquire despotic power over individuals who have forfeited their life through brazen aggression; the power of life and death thus obtained is a component of a lawful, if extreme, form of government over their persons. Committing capital crimes thus makes people liable to be killed and liable to be involuntarily subjected to another's rule. Divine proprietorship of human life implies that all lawful slavery is penal slavery.

[57] Whether perfect slaves have personal obligations to obey their masters, grounded not in compact but in crime, is unclear. Locke's line of reasoning in ST §§185-187 may make us think so. The standard just war view that unjust aggressors lack the right to forcibly resist just conquerors arguably suffices to establish slaves' duties of compliance.

[58] Locke was aware of the conceptual difference between forfeiture and voluntary alienation/renouncement of right (FT §100). A. John Simmons, On the Edge of Anarchy: Locke, Consent, and the Limits of Society (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993), 46–48.

VI. Conclusion

This essay aspired to illuminate the meaning and normative significance of Locke's theory of self-ownership by exploring the interrelations between self-ownership of one's person and divine proprietorship of human life. I have argued that Locke does not endorse full self-ownership: "the fullest right a person (logically) can have over herself provided that each other person also has just such a right."[59] This holds true regardless of whether we conceive of self-ownership as rights in our person or in our life. My interpretation is fairly uncontroversial regarding life-ownership: God has merely granted us rights of exclusive use and usufruct in our life and body, compatible with ultimate divine ownership. More surprising perhaps is my contention that Locke does not endorse full self-ownership of one's person either.

Lockean "property in one's person," this essay has shown, is a narrower concept than self-ownership standardly understood. The concept does not capture all the rights we can logically have in ourselves—such as over our body, skills, and labor. Rather, Lockean self-ownership expresses that humans, by nature free and independent, are entitled to enter conditions of subjection of their own choosing (when they hit maturity). For Locke, self-ownership is thus a contrastive thesis: nobody—not even God—initially has rights in my person but me. While this makes every human by nature "absolute Lord of his own Person and Possessions, equal to the greatest, and subject to no Body," it does not follow that we therefore have full property in our own person (as Locke understood the term). Divine dominium of human life renders it impossible for us to consensually establish absolute rule since that requires transference of a power that we never had over our own life. Divine proprietorship thus directly restricts the set of rights we have in our life and body, and indirectly curtails rights in our person. Since neither restriction is logically necessitated, I conclude that Locke rejects full self-ownership in both our life and our person.

[59] G. A. Cohen, Self-Ownership, Freedom, and Equality (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995), 213. Which rights humans have in virtue of being self-owners depends on how the concept is fleshed out, with "full self-ownership" granting to individuals as large a set of property rights in themselves as they can morally have in inanimate objects. Peter Vallentyne and Hillel Steiner, "Introduction: Left-Libertarianism: A Primer," in Vallentyne and Steiner, eds., Left-Libertarianism and Its Critics: The Contemporary Debate (Basingstoke: Palgrave MacMillan, 2000), 2–5. It is noteworthy that Locke invokes a premise external to self-ownership to rule out self-enslavement: divine ownership of human life. This helps explain why modern Lockean philosophers, who have uniformly dismissed Locke's theological assumptions, waver on the issue of self-enslavement. Placing moral limits on the relations people can consensually enter (other than the rights of others) smacks of paternalism. Some libertarians have followed Nozick in biting the bullet: "a free system will allow [an individual] to sell himself into slavery."[60] Nozick's concession seems simultaneously in accord with and in violation of the spirit of freedom animating the idea of self-ownership: in accord with, insofar as humans are free to enter any relation they wish (provided they do not violate the rights of others); in violation of, insofar as coercive and oppressive relationships are thus legitimated. Some proponents of self-ownership have sought to define self-ownership "in such a way that it does not allow people to sell themselves into slavery."[61] Critics have cried "ad hoc," insisting that libertarians can have no principled objection to self-enslavement.[62] Regardless of what we think of this critique, lawful self-enslavement remains a logical possibility as long as we continue to conceive of self-ownership rights along Lockean lines as property rights, which are in principle alienable.

Martin Bennett: Lawyer representing Linda Reynolds against Brittany Higgins fined for professional misconduct

The high-profile lawyer representing Senator Linda Reynolds in her defamation case against Brittany Higgins has been slapped with a hefty fine for professional misconduct after airing protected health information when attempting to have the attorney-general intervene in a legal matter before the court.

Martin Bennett was at the centre of a misconduct investigation launched by the Legal Services and Complaints Committee.

The WA State Administrative Tribunal found Mr Bennett had engaged in two counts of professional misconduct and one count of unsatisfactory professional misconduct.

In 2017, Mr Bennett brought a guardianship matter to the State Administrative Tribunal on behalf of his clients to appoint a guardian and administrator for the clients' father.

At a Supreme Court hearing, Mr Bennett read out a client affidavit, which referred to protected mental health information from documents obtained by the firm.

The affidavit referred to the guardianship proceedings being brought on the basis that the clients' father had an impaired cognitive condition and also included medical reports.

The State Administrative Tribunal found that Mr Bennett had considered genuinely, but incorrectly, that the affidavit was being used for a purpose permitted by the tribunal orders and before filing the affidavit he did not ensure this was permitted.

The tribunal found his conduct in permitting the affidavit to be filed in Supreme Court proceedings was "grossly careless", and it had the potential to affect the tribunal's consideration of the guardianship application.

This included "potentially causing the tribunal to erroneously conclude that any protected Information disclosed in the client affidavit had been known to the clients independently of the documents made available to the firm".

In addition, Mr Bennett wrote to the WA Attorney General on his clients' instruction, requesting the AG's intervention in a charitable trust connected to the clients' family.

The letter disclosed information concerning the mental health of the clients' father.

Those documents were subject to the Harman Obligation — an implied understanding that documents obtained through the court will only be used for the purposes for which they were disclosed and will not be used for a collateral or ulterior purpose.

The committee found breaching this was "grossly careless in that the practitioner did not turn his mind to whether the AG letter contained information derived from documents the subject of the Harman Obligation".

The SAT found Mr Bennett's conduct "fell substantially short of the standard of competence and diligence that a member of the public is entitled to expect of a reasonably competent Australian legal practitioner approved by members of the legal profession of good repute and competence".

Mr Bennett was fined $23,000 and ordered to pay a further $12,500 for the applicant's costs.

Would the Chief Executive Officer and Principal registrar Sia kindly address the following matters via a private reply to our foreign office.

we understand that Australia is a common law jurisdiction as read on various government department websites and nowhere could we find a trace claiming that Australia is a 'Civil law' jurisdiction. Similarly, when Police is approached for reporting of a crime, if the crime is of a civil nature the police advise they do not get involved with Civil matters, thereby any reasonable man or woman would conclude it is not a law they wish to subscribe to and as such they can choose for civil laws not to apply to them and express to revoke any previous election to consent to being subject to fraud and swindles and modern day slavery.

From SA Law Handbook (live at https://lawhandbook.sa.gov.au/go01.php)
civil law
Law which is not public (criminal, administrative, constitutional, international) or church law, that is, private law. It may mean law based on the Roman system. Throughout this book, civil law means non-criminal law.

equity
1. Fairness. A system of legal rules developed by the Lord Chancellor and special courts in England to make the common law fairer. 2. A financial interest in property or goods.

common law
The part of English law traditionally based on common custom and being unwritten. Law which is not equity, statute, or ecclesiastical (church).

statute
A law made by Parliament (state or Commonwealth).

Marriage Act 1961 defines marriage as the following marriage means the union of 2 people to the exclusion of all others, voluntarily entered into for life.

On a private note to us Christian who abide by god's divine law and laws of nature, we wish to experss that what god's will has caused to happen by uniting a man and woman due to divine intervention (as said in Matthew 19:6) and a chance meeting owing our fate to god, is protected and sacred to peoples religious beliefs and not subject to interference by statutory encroachments. We understand god and divine law and laws of nature are foreign to your courts.

1. Do you not agree that when both man and woman are still alive and have capacity to manage their private household needs, the state has no jurisdiction to intermeddle with a foreigner's non-resident estates and their offspring's testamentary & trust funds?

2. Do you not agree that if both man and woman are still alive and in good health, it is fraud and contempt in face of the court for any third party to attempt create controversy in attempt to defraud the people using the courts as utility to conduct their fraud?

3. Do you not agree that in absence of any evidence and report of harm to another, the court has zero jurisdiction to enter property of a non-consenting foreign sovereign?

4. Does you not agree as per your website that any document which is stamped as 'lodged' has not been accepted for filing and does not form part of court record?

5. Do you not agree that reports of securities fraud, mail fraud, estate fraud, tax fraud, conspiracy to commit tax fraud, conspiracy to commit estate and trust fraud, conspiracy to commit securities fraud is something that should be taken seriously by the court administrator and investigate with due diligence with engaging of Federal Police and CDPP for prosecution of the fraudsters using the honourable court as cloak for fraud?

6. do you not agree that unlawful stealing of funds from a foreign national and former refugee non-resident adult who does not recognize the unsolicited spam letters sent to fictitious addressees

7. Are registrar's permitted to refuse to file evidence delivered to the court mailing location via International Registered mail article? if yes, kindly advise under what authority and whether it be common law, equity or admiralty jurisdiction.

8. As discussed in Judgment given in United States v. Will, 449 U.S. 200, are any judge or magistrate who acts where he or she does not have jurisdiction to act, the judge is guilty of treason?

9. Similarly to facts said in Question No.8 - are any other judges or attorneys who do not report the above judges for treason as required by law may also be guilty of misprision of treason?

10. When a mandatory notice and confidential report is made to the court, is the judicial officer who accepts the delivery of the draft bill of complaint in registered mail not morally bound, compelled by their judicial oath, and enjoined in equity to handle the matter with clean hands in equity and follow the rule of law?

Sent in good faith and sincere intent. This correspondence is not intended as vexatious nor prolix and i speak from first hand knowledge of facts.

Notice of intent to file a confidential report of protected matter with evidence under seal
Whilst this is not the official report it is a notice of intent to file a complaint to the Law court administrator and Attorney General and this enquiry is the last show of good faith to offer cooperation to work with the judicial officers to remedy the damages and harm caused by incompetence of the only solicitor on record who has acted in dishonour and refused our offer to indemnify him and hold him harmless and as such declined to evaluate our evidence, that is to say that we are not dead, and that our non-resident estate, which has been transferred to Australian government and Minister for Immigration, is valued in excess of 250 Million Dollars and based on our research and evidence is likely valued in-specie somewhere around the sum certain of ThreeBillionFiveHundredMillion-dollars and provided said legal practitioner a list of securities, cusips, isin to validate and have a third party valuation done on the estate assets and securities.

we wish no harm to another, but we have to protect the interest of our young people and and our future generations and if we stood by idle when all this is happening before our very eyes, then we would not be worthy of god's gift of having our offspring borne through us.

As far as we know, each nation of the realm acknowledges that god's law is superior to any man made laws no matter whether they be Mohammedan and Christian or Abrahamic. Civil religion does not believe in god's law and as such we do not recognize it as any valid authority to intermeddle with our private contracts and agreements.

Dear Sandi

Thank you for your email of 21 November 2023 to the Attorney-General's Department. I acknowledge the frustration you have expressed about your matter.

We reiterate our advice provided to you on 23 June 2023. The Australian Human Rights Commission is an independent statutory authority, established under the Australian Human Rights Commission Act 1986. Although the Commission falls within the Attorney-General's portfolio responsibility, it is independent from the Government. Therefore, we do not have oversight of their complaints handling process so cannot provide you an update on your complaint.

If you have not already done so, you may wish to contact the Commission's National Information Service on 1300 656 419 or by email at infoservice@humanrights.gov.au.

Unless new issues are raised, further correspondence from you may not receive a response.

Kind Regards,

Dear Attorney-general,

I filed a Human rights complaint back in February 2023 and yet to hear from anyone regareding the complaint.

I sincerely hope that the avenue for filing a complaint isn't just another channel for people to waste their time in hope of getting remedy and protection from the government which is supposed to protect the people who elected them.

I refuse to believe that a global and multinational Sovereign state such as Australia turns its back on people in need of protection whilst those who have committed crimes of kidnapping, deprivation of liberty, servitude, fraud, to be able to derive benefit and avoid detriment to their firm and the principal and partner and for the Attorney General refusing to intervene when honourably invited to do so.

Honourably,
Sandi, creditor

Good morning Daniel,

Whilst I appreciate you applying from a group FOI mailbox it was an invitation to discuss matters with you in the capacity of Chief legal counsel as per email sig.

we did draft about 4 different emails to reply to you for a review but upon reflection it was hard to find suitable words for an email to assure it does not get received as a negative or combative reply from me. There have been some interactions i have had with Federal Police

I must also disclose that, although i did report back to your FOI mailbox that i am not the named recipient (Mr Matic) i did subsequently open the file to view as per my correspondences earlier, it is a matter of international private laws and concerning people with protected status in Australia as refugees, reporting fraud which i have honest belief it is fraud against the Commonwealth, and Modern Slavery - as defined by the two links below.

Work restrictions Modern Slavery | Australian Human Rights Commission

- Know that it is a serious criminal offence for an employer to force you to work by threatening or deceiving you, restricting your freedom to leave or forcing you to pay off an unexplained debt. This behaviour should be reported to the Australian Federal Police on 131 237.

Affirmation (Second) of friendship neutrality and diplomatic immunity

By: Sandi, a refugee

year 43 of this issue

We wish to express our gratitude to the Government of the Commonwealth of Australia for granting our household of four people safe passage to re-settle on Australia, it is gesture of kindness by a foreign state that will be forever etched in the fabric of our existence.

We further wish to express that we are forever a friend of Australian Government and to the greater extent the United States of America and we do claim by right of status as a non-citizen national of the United States.

We are in fact a friends of every good man or woman who actively pursues peace making as their mantra.

We are have heard in the past, phrases like 'sovereign citizens' used in the media and associated with beligerant and hostile attitude toward law enforcement and policemen and policewomen or members of public-at-large and therefore we wish to expressly reject any association with such a group of people.

At the same time, we are familiar with the phrase 'sovereign immunity' as we have filed the paperwork with Australian Taxation Office via form NAT 75254, although we have not heard back since it was filed some 6+ months ago we have no reason to believe that we would not qualify, especially given we've never taken a citizenship pledge nor applied for citizenship anywhere in the world, and upon reaching age of twenty-one and no longer being in age of minority, all voidable contracts including social contracts or adhesion contrats are voidable and we did void them.

SANDI MATIC is a Commonwealth owned registered business name, acquired through the Hague convention for intercountry adoptions with ACC 1113275, i' uncertain if it has an ABN/ACN or any other identifier in a proprietary database. I am not it, but i have been acting for it unknowingly without having legal knowledge of what is going on. I do have an ACN of 664 173 602 that was issued when i updated the details to unincorporate the entity and it issued it with a new ABN 77 519 220 587

I do certainly have a beneficial interest in SANDI MATIC through.

I, the man typing this email turns out have never had my birth recorded (so the Bosnian embassy in Canberra tells me) and i need to do a subsequent late birth registration to amend the record. I am having a hard time living my life however with constant deprivation of rights under colour of law by various people simply because they dont know what is going on and i wish to invite you for assisting me with this as i have proactively contacted the AFP, AGS, ASIC, ATO, EAC, Attorney-General's office, Treasury, Privacy at Treasury, NAA to make everyone aware of the situation.

The ATO has marked the entity as LARGE BUSINESS INTERNATIONAL LB&I which according to ATO website is an entity doing over $250million in revenue annually. Meanwhile i am near homeless if not for mum and dad, without a job or work entitlements, nor receiving any benefit or government allowances yet Centrelink refuses to cancel the CRN so that i can settle all accounts and debts to the Commonwealth government for my upbringing from age 13 up until now.

Is there something i am doing wrong and would you kindly provide some advice and guidance to remedy the situation.

I am aware of the catchphrase that departments do not give legal advice but as Federal police i am inviting you to intervene as there are others with absolutely no entitlement to any of the property or funds of SANDI MATIC whom have been defrauding the name by deception and fraud, and if this is a Commonwealth Entity then it is a crime against the Commonwealth.

And if i am someone with beneficial interest in the Commonwealth entity then i do have the right of claim to the office of Commonwealth Public Official, for which an Notary sealed document is enclosed.

I wish to invite you for a legal opinion as to the validity of this document. It has in the past been provided to the Supreme Court, Home Affairs, State Administrative Tribunal, AGS, and various others and since such time, there has been questions raised about my mental state (which is solid as the foundation of the earth) claiming it to be a 'fake certificate' and if that's the case i wish to have it destroyed if it is not permitted by law and if that were the case someone would have said so by now.

The WA Supreme court has even published it in their online judgments so they have in a way validated it as my second witness, because if it were not valid, i would have been charged with impersonating a Commonwealth Public Official, but instead the only Solicitor on record (whom i reported for fraud and contempt of court via email to Attorney General) in a civil matter fraudulently appointed himself as the counsel for both plaintiff and defendent and enjoined the defendent by an injunction to the contempt of court and claimed that i am the guilty one and i did not know what enjoin meant at the time so he essentially had me imprisoned and fined for letting him get away with the fraud by not having it properly reported and having him arrested.

TO ENJOIN. To command; to require; as, private individuals are not only permitted, but enjoined by law to arrest an offender when present at the time a felony is committed or dangerous wound given, on pain of fine and imprisonment if the wrong doer escape through their negligence. In a more technical sense, to enjoin, is to command or order a defendant in equity to do or not to do a particular thing by writ of injunction. Vide Injunction.

Elsewhere in transcripts he refers to a statement i made in open court as 'his son' so uncertain if he has acquired by adoption the entity which was presumed to be abandoned whilst the beneficiary of the entity is standing right there in court claiming to be the beneficary entitled to the enter the estate and be recognized as the beneficial owner.

I acknowledge these statements are of a serious nature and i do not make them lightly but there is just no end in sight for it as i keep having further attempts to deprive me of every liberty and freedom known to people throughout generations whilst having everything of my ancestors stripped off by fraud and swindles like i am dealing with solicitor-pirates.

Baristers are not exempt from keeping within their authority and as far as i know, fraud and kidnapping, trafficking of persons, peonage etc are not written down in any Common law country in the world as permissible actions by one man to another.

But surely at some point the law has to be enforced and the innocent party protected, specially as they have not harmed anyone nor sought any retribution but offered forgiveness in order to move on.

Acknowledgment and appreciation for policemen and policewomen

Just to finalise i have the highest of aprpeciation for police in general and my son from 3 years old has wanted to become a policeman so i know that policemen and women are good people, but their perception can someimes be easilly manipulated by people who are deceithful where by the victim of a crime ends up being punished for the crime simply because the fraudsters know how to work the system and get it reported before having detriment to themselves.

The several times i have attempted to file a complaint about this with the police i am told that they don't get involved with civil matters.

Great, that is a perfect gauge as to what laws i should be accepting as rule of law, something whereby if there is a breach of a law, the police will intervene and protect the innocent and punish the criminal committing the crime.

If the police dont get involved with civil matters then they should not be enforcing civil rules by getting tricked by the baristers as to the nature of the situation.

But at the same time, when peoples inalienable rights to liberty of existence without being kidnapped, tortured, extorted are done under color of law in the civil jurisdiction then the police absolutely must get involved, and as such i invite you to get involved.

Any civil or criminal matter i am fairly certain according to the bible can be settled via acceptance and offering to pay the prescribed amount to the injured party, unless there has been someone harmed damaged or theres damage to property.

I as the private individual do not have a Trustee willing to take on this role in Western Australia due to conflicts of interest

AS defined in TRUSTEES PROTECTION. 22° GEO. V., No. IX. No. 9 of 1931.

Any public official or part of the corporate and incorporated bodies of the Commonwealth or the State are by default trustees for me if i am the beneficiary.

"Beneficiary" means any person or body, whether corporate or incorporate, on whose behalf or for whose benefit a trustee is holding any estate, whether such estate is held in the name of the beneficiary or in the name of the trustee or in any other name on behalf of or for the benefit of the beneficiary.

"Trustee" means and includes a trustee within the meaning of the Trustees Act, 1900, and any official trustee, public official, attorney, agent, company, body whether corporate or incorporate, association, director or other officer of a company, body, or association, committee of management, and any other person between whom and a beneficiary there exists, whether by operation of law, or by the provisions of any instrument, or otherwise howsoever, a fiduciary relationship by reason whereof the trustee has the right, power, or authority to dispose of or to manage and control or to deal with the estate of the beneficiary without being required first to obtain from the beneficiary his consent to the exercise by the trustee of any such right, power, or authority as aforesaid.

If someone else wishes to claim to be the beneficiary and wants me to be the trustee i am will consider role but i wish to be paid compensation for being the Trustee and i think a fair amount for that is $875,000 annually, or if anyone thinks its too high they can propose a lower amount

In the interest of time, we wish to notice you that we intend to use this letter as a reference for the complaint for grievance to other relevant regulators so please let us know via email if you object to this or if it is acceptable from your standpoint.

South Australian Law handbook (online)

civil law

Law which is not public (criminal, administrative, constitutional, international) or church law, that is, private law. It may mean law based on the Roman system. (emphasis added) Throughout this book, civil law means non-criminal law

Bouvier's Law Dictionary

LAW. 2. Law is generally divided into four principle classes, namely; Natural law, the law of nations, public law, and private or civil law

LAW OF NATURE. The law of nature is that which God, the sovereign of the universe, has prescribed to all men, not by any formal promulgation, but by the internal dictate of reason alone. It is discovered by a just consideration of the agreeableness or disagreeableness of human actions to the nature of man; and it comprehends all the duties which we owe either to the Supreme Being, to ourselves, or to our neighbors; as reverence to God, self-defence, temperance, honor to our parents, benevolence to all, a strict adherence to our engagements, gratitude, and the like.

LAW, COMMON. The common law is that which derives its force and authority from the universal consent and immemorial practice of the people. It has never received the sanction of the legislature, by an express act, which is the criterion by which it is distinguished from the statute law. It has never been reduced to writing; by this expression, however, it is not meant that all those laws are at present merely oral, or communicated from former ages to the present solely by word of mouth, but that the evidence of our common law is contained in our books of Reports, and depends on the general practice and judicial adjudications of our courts.

2. The common law is derived from two sources, the common law of England, and the practice and decision of our own courts. In some states the English common law has been adopted by statute. There is no general rule to ascertain what part of the English common law is valid and binding. To run the line of distinction, is a subject of embarrassment to courts, and the want of it a great perplexity to the student. Kirb. Rep. Pref. It may, however, be observed generally, that it is binding where it has not been superseded by the constitution of the United States, or of the several states, or by their legislative enactments, or varied by custom, and where it is founded in reason and consonant to the genius and manners of the people.

3. The phrase "common law" occurs in the seventh article of the amendments of the constitution of the United States. "In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall not exceed twenty dollar says that article, "the right of trial by jury shall be preserved. The "common law" here mentioned is the common law of England, and not of any particular state. 1 Gallis. 20; 1 Bald. 558; 3 Wheat. 223; 3 Pet. R. 446; 1 Bald. R. 554. The term is used in contradistinction to equity, admiralty, and maritime law. 3 Pet. 446; 1 Bald. 554

LAW, CIVIL. The term civil law is generally applied by way of eminence to the civil or municipal law of the Roman empire

2. The Institutes contain the elements or first principles of the Roman law, in four books

4. By the term civil law is also understood the particular law of each people, opposed to natural law, or the law of nations, which are common to all. Just. Inst. l. 1, t. 1, §1, 2; Ersk. Pr. L. Scot. B. 1, t. 1, s. 4. In this sense it, is used by Judge Swift. See below.

5. Civil law is also sometimes understood as that which has emanated from the secular power opposed to the ecclesiastical or military.

6. Sometimes by the term civil law is meant those laws which relate to civil matters only; and in this sense it is opposed to criminal law, or to those laws which concern criminal matters. Vide Civil.

7. Judge Swift, in his System of the Laws of Connecticut, prefers the term civil law, to that of municipal law. He considers the term municipal to be too limited in its signification. He defines civil law to be a rule of human action, adopted by mankind in a state of society, or prescribed by the supreme power of the government, requiring a course of conduct not repugnant to morality or religion, productive of the greatest political happiness, and prohibiting actions contrary thereto, and which is enforced by the sanctions of pains and penalties. 1 Sw. Syst. 37. See Ayl. Pand. B. 1, t. 2, p. 6.

See, in general, as to civil law, Cooper's Justinian the Pandects; 1 Bl. Com. 80, 81; EncyclopÇdie, art. Droit Civil, Droit Romain; Domat, Les Loix Civiles; Ferriere's Dict.; Brown's Civ. Law; Halifax's Analys. Civ. Law; Wood's Civ. Law; Ayliffe's Pandects; Heinec. Elem. Jur.; Erskine's Institutes; Pothier; Eunomus, Dial. 1; Corpus Juris Civilis; Taylor's Elem. Civ. Law.

BARRISTER, English law. A counsellor admitted to plead at the bar.

5. Barristers are called apprentices, apprentitii ad legem, being looked upon as learners, and not qualified until they obtain the degree of serjeant. Edmund Plowden, the author of the Commentaries, a volume of elaborate reports in the reigns of Edward VI., Mary, Philip and Mary, and Elizabeth, describes himself as an apprentice of the common law.

barratry

Barratry is the act of encouraging lawsuits between others in order to create legal business for one’s personal gain and profit. Barratry is illegal in all U.S. states. Attorneys who are found guilty of barratry will be subject to criminal punishment or discipline by the state bar. They could also lose their license to practice law.

Barratry includes attorneys looking for victims in hospitals to generate business income , as attorneys are prohibited from soliciting employment through live person-to person contact. Attorneys who follow victims and solicit them for business are most commonly referred to as “ambulance chasers.”

Barratry can also be done for harassment purposes. One form of this is strategic lawsuits against public participation, also known as SLAPP suits . SLAPP suits can be used to intimidate and silence criticism by bringing an expensive, baseless lawsuit against opponents. Plaintiffs often know their claim is baseless and will not result in a victory, but they hope to scare their opponents and others from criticizing them any further through the legal process. Several states have enacted anti-SLAPP statutes to avoid these kinds of lawsuits from burdening the legal system and to protect freedom of speech.

Kindly refer to the chain of email correspondence below between ourselves and APRA representative Daniel, with last correspondence by us sent to Apra Licencing on 02 January 2025.

Having not heard back we deem this as satisfaction and accord and evidence of compliance with prescribed regulations that may apply from time to time in Australia.

Notice of promissory estoppel
Having not received an objection within five business days we trust that we have satisfied the test to APRA licencing team as at no point was there any claim to not to be entitled to the word 'banker' or 'bank' to be included in our trade name/business name, but simply an invitation to continue with the application or abandon it which we took the pleasure in continuing with.

We offer you the liberty of conferring with APRA if you wish, otherwise we thank you for your timely finalizing of this pending application which has now been outstanding since 1 August, 2024 (160 days).

Filed respectfully and with clean hands in equity.

Introduction

About this form

Complete this form if you fit into one of the following categories:

- You are a business that provides Remittance Services that is required to register with AUSTRAC under Part 6 of the Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 (AML/CTF Act).
- You are a business that provides Digital Currency Exchange services that is required to register with AUSTRAC under Part 6A of the Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 (AML/CTF Act).

This form cannot be used to:

- Update business details if you are already enrolled or registered. The update business profile form is available in your business's AUSTRAC Online account.
- Remove your business from the Reporting Entity Roll, Remittance Sector Register or the Digital Currency Exchange Register. If your business has ceased providing designated services, you must submit a request to remove the business from the Reporting Entities Roll. This removal form is available in your business's AUSTRAC Online account.
- Register multiple businesses. A separate form is required to be submitted for each business.

Note: For businesses providing Remittance and Digital Currency Exchange services, AUSTRAC may request further information or documents for the purposes of making a decision in relation to this application. This may include:

- a national police certificate or national police history check that has been issued within the six month period preceding the date of the application for registration, for each of the key personnel.
- if applicable, the original or a certified copy of a remittance network provider's consent to make an application for registration as a remittance affiliate of the remittance network provider.

Do not lodge these documents with this form – we will request these from you at a later stage if we need to view them.

Completing the form

AUSTRAC has developed an explanatory guide to help you complete this form. Click here to access the explanatory guide.

- You can save the form, including the data you have entered, and come back to it later. A link will be emailed to you upon saving your form for the first time. You must keep a copy of this email to retrieve your saved form. Please note, the link within the email expires 14 days from when it is first saved. When this link expires, your saved draft form will be permanently deleted, and you will need to start a new form.
- Where possible, fields within the form have been populated with information about the business. This information must be checked for accuracy prior to submitting the form.
- You can print a draft of the form, including the data you have entered, from the last page.
- All pages of the form must be completed to enable form submission.

Submission of the form

- The form will be submitted electronically to AUSTRAC. A receipt will be provided to the person completing the form at the time of submission.

Notice of cancellation

Your GST registration is cancelled and is effective as of 2 October 2001.

The reason for cancellation is due to you no longer carrying on an enterprise.

If you wish to discuss this matter further, please contact the ATO Call Centre on 13 24 78.

Review rights

The following decisions are reviewable GST decisions under the Taxation Administration Act 1953:

- cancelling your GST registration and
- deciding the effective date of cancellation.

You may object against these decisions if you are dissatisfied with them. Your objection must:

- be in writing
- stating fully the grounds you are relying on, and
- be lodged with the Commissioner of Taxation within 60 days from the date of service of this notice.

Taxpayers' Charter

The Taxpayers' Charter outlines your rights and obligations under the law as well as the service and standards you can expect when dealing with the ATO. You can obtain a copy of the Taxpayers' Charter from our website at www.ato.gov.au or by phoning 1300 720 092.

The Problem Resolution Service within the ATO can assist you if you are dissatisfied with a decision or action of the ATO. Otherwise, you have a right to external review by the Special Tax Adviser to the Commonwealth Ombudsman. The Ombudsman has wide powers to investigate problems between taxpayers and the ATO.

Introduction

About this form

Complete this form if you fit into one of the following categories:

- You are a business that is required to enrol with AUSTRAC under Part 3A of the Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Act 2006 (AML/CTF Act).
- You are a business that provides remittance services that is required to register with AUSTRAC under Part 6 of the AML/CTF Act.
- You are a business that provides digital currency exchange services that is required to register with AUSTRAC under Part 6A of the AML/CTF Act.
- You are a business that is required to report to AUSTRAC under the Financial Transaction Reports Act 1988 (FTR Act).
- You are a foreign business that intends to join a designated business group under Chapter 2 of the Anti-Money Laundering and Counter-Terrorism Financing Rules Instrument 2007 (No.1) (AML/CTF Rules).

Do not use this form to remove your business from the Reporting Entity Roll, Remittance Sector Register or the Digital Currency Exchange Register. If your business has ceased providing designated services, you must submit a request to remove the business from the Reporting Entities Roll. This removal form is available in your AUSTRAC Online business profile page.

AUSTRAC has developed an explanatory guide to help you complete this form. Click here (https://www.austrac.gov.au/business/how-comply-guidance-and-resources/guidance-resources/austrac-business-profile-form-abpf-explanatory-guide) to access the explanatory guide.

Note: For businesses providing remittance and digital currency exchange services, you must make the following documents available if requested:

- a national police certificate or national police history check that has been issued within the six month period preceding the date of the application for registration, for each of the key personnel.
- if applicable, the original or a certified copy of a remittance network provider’s consent to make an application for registration as a remittance affiliate of the remittance network provider.

Do not lodge these documents with this form – we will request these from you at a later stage if we need to view them.

Completing the form

- You can save the form, including the data you have entered, and come back to it later. You will be prompted to provide a verification code as part of saving your form. You must keep a copy of this verification code, as you will need to enter this code to retrieve your saved form.
- You can print a draft of the form, including the data you have entered, from the last page.
- Fields marked with an asterisk (*) are mandatory and must be completed before you can submit the form.
- You can check that the data entered on each page of the form is valid by clicking the 'Validate current page' button at the end of each page. When you update your responses to the form, it is advisable to re-validate the page.
- You can navigate to any page of the form by clicking on the navigation bar at the top of each page.
- Where possible, fields within the form have been populated with information about the business. This information must be checked for accuracy prior to submitting the form.
- Dates must be selected using the calendar icon in each date field. To find the date you can scroll by month, or select a month and type the year.
- All pages of the form must be completed to enable form submission.

Submitting the form

- Once completed, the form will be submitted electronically to AUSTRAC. A receipt will be provided to the person completing the form at the time of submission.
- You will need to access and submit one copy of the form for each business. It is not possible to reuse forms for multiple businesses.

Form 56 (Rev. 12-2011)

The original Assignor signed Form 56 - Fiduciary contract is to remain with the ASSIGNOR, therefore with this copy you have 3 day as your Right to chose, to sign the contract or not to sign but if you chose not to sign you are then required to vacate your present office of American Maritime Commercial Monetary Fiduciary responsibility because you have dishonored the Office. Either way after 3 days; a copy of the accepted or rejected decision is require to be returned to the ASSIGNOR. Upon acceptance it is then under the 3 day Rule of Law to have it resolved or settled; with all remaining RES-I-DUE returned to the ASSIGNOR.

As the ASSIGNEE / RE-ASSIGNEE of this Fiduciary Action, you are now under a Form of exposure to the Law that is needed to bring about the Resolve and Settlement of the above identified Civil "Maritime Commercial" Court Case, for the proper disposition of the Residue.

This action is the original LESSOR's demand for Rent Due from the government LESSEES per the government Maritime Commercial Monetary Securities addressed in this Admiralty case by this Office and Flag of Land Admiral, the Maritime EXECUTOR; also known as the original Assignor/Re-assignor/Assertor.

Notice of Breach of Fiduciary Duty by Senior Member Eleanor Marillier

It is our wish and desire to formally notice Eleanor in her personal and unlimited capacity regarding an official report 'Referral' being filed together with this form with the Australian Financial Security Authority for breach of trust and attempting to hide assets of a bankrupt deceased estate to the detriment of the beneficiaries, one of which is United States Secretary to the Treasury.

Assignor/Re-assignor/Assertor: ____________________

(Under seal and bounded Landmarks-the two index witnesses of the Body/State of Man)

LEFT RIGHT

A signed copy by you as the ASSIGNEE of this Fiduciary contract is to be returned to the ASSIGNOR, of living substance.

Notice of cancellation

Your GST registration is cancelled and is effective as of 2 October 2001.

The reason for cancellation is due to you no longer carrying on an enterprise.

If you wish to discuss this matter further, please contact the ATO Call Centre on 13 24 78.

Review rights
The following decisions are reviewable GST decisions under the Taxation Administration Act 1953:

- cancelling your GST registration and
- deciding the effective date of cancellation.

You may object against these decisions if you are dissatisfied with them. Your objection must:

- be in writing
- stating fully the grounds you are relying on, and
- be lodged with the Commissioner of Taxation within 60 days from the date of service of this notice.

Taxpayers' Charter
The Taxpayers' Charter outlines your rights and obligations under the law as well as the service and standards you can expect when dealing with the ATO. You can obtain a copy of the Taxpayers' Charter from our website at www.ato.gov.au or by phoning 1300 720 092.

The Problem Resolution Service within the ATO can assist you if you are dissatisfied with a decision or action of the ATO. Otherwise, you have a right to external review by the Special Tax Adviser to the Commonwealth Ombudsman. The Ombudsman has wide powers to investigate problems between taxpayers and the ATO.

SECOND TREATISE OF GOVERNMENT by JOHN LOCKE

Digitized by Dave Gowan (dgowan@tfn.net). John Locke's "Second Treatise of Government" was published in 1690. The complete unabridged text has been republished several times in edited commentaries. This text is recovered entire from the paperback book, "John Locke Second Treatise of Government", Edited, with an Introduction, By C.B. McPherson, Hackett Publishing Company, Indianapolis and Cambridge, 1980. None of the McPherson edition is included in the Etext below; only the original words contained in the 1690 Locke text is included. The 1690 edition text is free of copyright.

PREFACE

Reader, thou hast here the beginning and end of a discourse concerning government; what fate has otherwise disposed of the papers that should have filled up the middle, and were more than all the rest, it is not worth while to tell thee. These, which remain, I hope are sufficient to establish the throne of our great restorer, our present King William; to make good his title, in the consent of the people, which being the only one of all lawful governments, he has more fully and clearly, than any prince in Christendom; and to justify to the world the people of England, whose love of their just and natural rights, with their resolution to preserve them, saved the nation when it was on the very brink of slavery and ruin. If these papers have that evidence, I flatter myself is to be found in them, there will be no great miss of those which are lost, and my reader may be satisfied without them: for I imagine, I shall have neither the time, nor inclination to repeat my pains, and fill up the wanting part of my answer, by tracing Sir Robert again, through all the windings and obscurities, which are to be met with in the several branches of his wonderful system. The king, and body of the nation, have since so thoroughly confuted his Hypothesis, that I suppose no body hereafter will have either the confidence to appear against our common safety, and be again an advocate for slavery; or the weakness to be deceived with contradictions dressed up in a popular stile, and well-turned periods: for if any one will be at the pains, himself, in those parts, which are here untouched, to strip Sir Robert's discourses of the flourish of doubtful expressions, and endeavour to reduce his words to direct, positive, intelligible propositions, and then compare them one with another, he will quickly be satisfied, there was never so much glib nonsense put together in well-sounding English. If he think it not worth while to examine his works all thro', let him make an experiment in that part, where he treats of usurpation; and let him try, whether he can, with all his skill, make Sir Robert intelligible, and consistent with himself, or common sense. I should not speak so plainly of a gentleman, long since past answering, had not the pulpit, of late years, publicly owned his doctrine, and made it the current divinity of the times. It is necessary those men, who taking on them to be teachers, have so dangerously misled others, should be openly shewed of what authority this their Patriarch is, whom they have so blindly followed, that so they may either retract what upon so ill grounds they have vented, and cannot be maintained; or else justify those principles which they preached up for gospel; though they had no better an author than an English courtier: for I should not have writ against Sir Robert, or taken the pains to shew his mistakes, inconsistencies, and want of (what he so much boasts of, and pretends wholly to build on) scripture-proofs, were there not men amongst us, who, by crying up his books, and espousing his doctrine, save me from the reproach of writing against a dead adversary. They have been so zealous in this point, that, if I have done him any wrong, I cannot hope they should spare me. I wish, where they have done the truth and the public wrong, they would be as ready to redress it, and allow its just weight to this reflection, viz. that there cannot be done a greater mischief to prince and people, than the propagating wrong notions concerning government; that so at last all times might not have reason to complain of the Drum Ecclesiastic. If any one, concerned really for truth, undertake the confutation of my Hypothesis, I promise him either to recant my mistake, upon fair conviction; or to answer his difficulties. But he must remember two things.

First, That cavilling here and there, at some expression, or little incident of my discourse, is not an answer to my book.

Secondly, That I shall not take railing for arguments, nor think either of these worth my notice, though I shall always look on myself as bound to give satisfaction to any one, who shall appear to be conscientiously scrupulous in the point, and shall shew any just grounds for his scruples.

I have nothing more, but to advertise the reader, that Observations stands for Observations on Hobbs, Milton, &c. and that a bare quotation of pages always means pages of his Patriarcha, Edition 1680.

CHAPTER. I.

AN ESSAY CONCERNING THE TRUE ORIGINAL, EXTENT AND END OF CIVIL GOVERNMENT

Sect. 1. It having been shewn in the foregoing discourse,

(1). That Adam had not, either by natural right of fatherhood, or by positive donation from God, any such authority over his children, or dominion over the world, as is pretended:

(2). That if he had, his heirs, yet, had no right to it:

(3). That if his heirs had, there being no law of nature nor positive law of God that determines which is the right heir in all cases that may arise, the right of succession, and consequently of bearing rule, could not have been certainly determined:

(4). That if even that had been determined, yet the knowledge of which is the eldest line of Adam's posterity, being so long since utterly lost, that in the races of mankind and families of the world, there remains not to one above another, the least pretence to be the eldest house, and to have the right of inheritance:

All these premises having, as I think, been clearly made out, it is impossible that the rulers now on earth should make any benefit, or derive any the least shadow of authority from that, which is held to be the fountain of all power, Adam's private dominion and paternal jurisdiction; so that he that will not give just occasion to think that all government in the world is the product only of force and violence, and that men live together by no other rules but that of beasts, where the strongest carries it, and so lay a foundation for perpetual disorder and mischief, tumult, sedition and rebellion, (things that the followers of that hypothesis so loudly cry out against) must of necessity find out another rise of government, another original of political power, and another way of designing and knowing the persons that have it, than what Sir Robert Filmer hath taught us.

Sect. 2. To this purpose, I think it may not be amiss, to set down what I take to be political power; that the power of a MAGISTRATE over a subject may be distinguished from that of a FATHER over his children, a MASTER over his servant, a HUSBAND over his wife, and a LORD over his slave. All which distinct powers happening sometimes together in the same man, if he be considered under these different relations, it may help us to distinguish these powers one from wealth, a father of a family, and a captain of a galley.

Sect. 3. POLITICAL POWER, then, I take to be a RIGHT of making laws with penalties of death, and consequently all less penalties, for the regulating and preserving of property, and of employing the force of the community, in the execution of such laws, and in the defence of the commonwealth from foreign injury; and all this only for the public good.

CHAPTER. II.

OF THE STATE OF NATURE.

Sect. 4. TO understand political power right, and derive it from its original, we must consider, what state all men are naturally in, and that is, a state of perfect freedom to order their actions, and dispose of their possessions and persons, as they think fit, within the bounds of the law of nature, without asking leave, or depending upon the will of any other man.

A state also of equality, wherein all the power and jurisdiction is reciprocal, no one having more than another; there being nothing more evident, than that creatures of the same species and rank, promiscuously born to all the same advantages of nature, and the use of the same faculties, should also be equal one amongst another without subordination or subjection, unless the lord and master of them all should, by any manifest declaration of his will, set one above another, and confer on him, by an evident and clear appointment, an undoubted right to dominion and sovereignty.

Sect. 5. This equality of men by nature, the judicious Hooker looks upon as so evident in itself, and beyond all question, that he makes it the foundation of that obligation to mutual love amongst men, on which he builds the duties they owe one another, and from whence he derives the great maxims of justice and charity. His words are,

> The like natural inducement hath brought men to know that it is no less their duty, to love others than themselves; for seeing those things which are equal, must needs all have one measure; if I cannot but wish to receive good, even as much at every man's hands, as any man can wish unto his own soul, how should I look to have any part of my desire herein satisfied, unless myself be careful to satisfy the like desire, which is undoubtedly in other men, being of one and the same nature? To have any thing offered them repugnant to this desire, must needs in all respects grieve them as much as me; so that if I do harm, I must look to suffer, there being no reason that others should shew greater measure of love to me, than they have by me shewed unto them: my desire therefore to be loved of my equals in nature as much as possible may be, imposeth upon me a natural duty of bearing to them-ward fully the like affection; from which relation of equality between ourselves and them that are as ourselves, what several rules and canons natural reason hath drawn, for direction of life, no man is ignorant, Eccl. Pol. Lib. 1.

Sect. 6. But though this be a state of liberty, yet it is not a state of licence: though man in that state have an uncontroulable liberty to dispose of his person or possessions, yet he has not liberty to destroy himself, or so much as any creature in his possession, but where some nobler use than its bare preservation calls for it. The state of nature has a law of nature to govern it, which obliges every one: and reason, which is that law, teaches all mankind, who will but consult it, that being all equal and independent, no one ought to harm another in his life, health, liberty, or possessions: for men being all the workmanship of one omnipotent, and infinitely wise maker; all the servants of one sovereign master, sent into the world by his order, and about his business; they are his property, whose workmanship they are, made to last during his, not one another's pleasure: and being furnished with like faculties, sharing all in one community of nature, there cannot be supposed any such subordination among us, that may authorize us to destroy one another, as if we were made for one another's uses, as the inferior ranks of creatures are for our's. Every one, as he is bound to preserve himself, and not to quit his station wilfully, so by the like reason, when his own preservation comes not in competition, ought he, as much as he can, to preserve the rest of mankind, and may not, unless it be to do justice on an offender, take away, or impair the life, or what tends to the preservation of the life, the liberty, health, limb, or goods of another.

Sect. 7. And that all men may be restrained from invading others rights, and from doing hurt to one another, and the law of nature be observed, which willeth the peace and preservation of all mankind, the execution of the law of nature is, in that state, put into every man's hands, whereby every one has a right to punish the transgressors of that law to such a degree, as may hinder its violation: for the law of nature would, as all other laws that concern men in this world be in vain, if there were no body that in the state of nature had a power to execute that law, and thereby preserve the innocent and restrain offenders. And if any one in the state of nature may punish another for any evil he has done, every one may do so: for in that state of perfect equality, where naturally there is no superiority or jurisdiction of one over another, what any may do in prosecution of that law, every one must needs have a right to do.

Sect. 8. And thus, in the state of nature, one man comes by a power over another; but yet no absolute or arbitrary power, to use a criminal, when he has got him in his hands, according to the passionate heats, or boundless extravagancy of his own will; but only to retribute to him, so far as calm reason and conscience dictate, what is proportionate to his transgression, which is so much as may serve for reparation and restraint: for these two are the only reasons, why one man may lawfully do harm to another, which is that we call punishment. In transgressing the law of nature, the offender declares himself to live by another rule than that of reason and common equity, which is that measure God has set to the actions of men, for their mutual security; and so he becomes dangerous to mankind, the tye, which is to secure them from injury and violence, being slighted and broken by him. Which being a trespass against the whole species, and the peace and safety of it, provided for by the law of nature, every man upon this score, by the right he hath to preserve mankind in general, may restrain, or where it is necessary, destroy things noxious to them, and so may bring such evil on any one, who hath transgressed that law, as may make him repent the doing of it, and thereby deter him, and by his example others, from doing the like mischief. And in the case, and upon this ground, EVERY MAN HATH A RIGHT TO PUNISH THE OFFENDER, AND BE EXECUTIONER OF THE LAW OF NATURE.

Sect. 9. I doubt not but this will seem a very strange doctrine to some men: but before they condemn it, I desire them to resolve me, by what right any prince or state can put to death, or punish an alien, for any crime he commits in their country. It is certain their laws, by virtue of any sanction they receive from the promulgated will of the legislative, reach not a stranger: they speak not to him, nor, if they did, is he bound to hearken to them. The legislative authority, by which they are in force over the subjects of that commonwealth, hath no power over him. Those who have the supreme power of making laws in England, France or Holland, are to an Indian, but like the rest of the world, men without authority: and therefore, if by the law of nature every man hath not a power to punish offences against it, as he soberly judges the case to require, I see not how the magistrates of any community can punish an alien of another country; since, in reference to him, they can have no more power than what every man naturally may have over another.

Sect, 10. Besides the crime which consists in violating the law, and varying from the right rule of reason, whereby a man so far becomes degenerate, and declares himself to quit the principles of human nature, and to be a noxious creature, there is commonly injury done to some person or other, and some other man receives damage by his transgression: in which case he who hath received any damage, has, besides the right of punishment common to him with other men, a particular right to seek reparation from him that has done it: and any other person, who finds it just, may also join with him that is injured, and assist him in recovering from the offender so much as may make satisfaction for the harm he has suffered.

Sect. 11. From these two distinct rights, the one of punishing the crime for restraint, and preventing the like offence, which right of punishing is in every body; the other of taking reparation, which belongs only to the injured party, comes it to pass that the magistrate, who by being magistrate hath the common right of punishing put into his hands, can often, where the public good demands not the execution of the law, remit the punishment of criminal offences by his own authority, but yet cannot remit the satisfaction due to any private man for the damage he has received. That, he who has suffered the damage has a right to demand in his own name, and he alone can remit: the damnified person has this power of appropriating to himself the goods or service of the offender, by right of self-preservation, as every man has a power to punish the crime, to prevent its being committed again, by the right he has of preserving all mankind, and doing all reasonable things he can in order to that end: and thus it is, that every man, in the state of nature, has a power to kill a murderer, both to deter others from doing the like injury, which no reparation can compensate, by the example of the punishment that attends it from every body, and also to secure men from the attempts of a criminal, who having renounced reason, the common rule and measure God hath given to mankind, hath, by the unjust violence and slaughter he hath committed upon one, declared war against all mankind, and therefore may be destroyed as a lion or a tyger, one of those wild savage beasts, with whom men can have no society nor security: and upon this is grounded that great law of nature, Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. And Cain was so fully convinced, that every one had a right to destroy such a criminal, that after the murder of his brother, he cries out, Every one that findeth me, shall slay me; so plain was it writ in the hearts of all mankind.

Sect. 12. By the same reason may a man in the state of nature punish the lesser breaches of that law. It will perhaps be demanded, with death? I answer, each transgression may be punished to that degree, and with so much severity, as will suffice to make it an ill bargain to the offender, give him cause to repent, and terrify others from doing the like. Every offence, that can be committed in the state of nature, may in the state of nature be also punished equally, and as far forth as it may, in a commonwealth: for though it would be besides my present purpose, to enter here into the particulars of the law of nature, or its measures of punishment; yet, it is certain there is such a law, and that too, as intelligible and plain to a rational creature, and a studier of that law, as the positive laws of commonwealths; nay, possibly plainer; as much as reason is easier to be understood, than the fancies and intricate contrivances of men, following contrary and hidden interests put into words; for so truly are a great part of the municipal laws of countries, which are only so far right, as they are founded on the law of nature, by which they are to be regulated and interpreted.

Sect. 13. To this strange doctrine, viz. That in the state of nature every one has the executive power of the law of nature, I doubt not but it will be objected, that it is unreasonable for men to be judges in their own cases, that self-love will make men partial to themselves and their friends: and on the other side, that ill nature, passion and revenge will carry them too far in punishing others; and hence nothing but confusion and disorder will follow, and that therefore God hath certainly appointed government to restrain the partiality and violence of men. I easily grant, that civil government is the proper remedy for the inconveniencies of the state of nature, which must certainly be great, where men may be judges in their own case, since it is easy to be imagined, that he who was so unjust as to do his brother an injury, will scarce be so just as to condemn himself for it: but I shall desire those who make this objection, to remember, that absolute monarchs are but men; and if government is to be the remedy of those evils, which necessarily follow from men's being judges in their own cases, and the state of nature is therefore not to be endured, I desire to know what kind of government that is, and how much better it is than the state of nature, where one man, commanding a multitude, has the liberty to be judge in his own case, and may do to all his subjects whatever he pleases, without the least liberty to any one to question or controul those who execute his pleasure? and in whatsoever he doth, whether led by reason, mistake or passion, must be submitted to? much better it is in the state of nature, wherein men are not bound to submit to the unjust will of another: and if he that judges, judges amiss in his own, or any other case, he is answerable for it to the rest of mankind.

Sect. 14. It is often asked as a mighty objection, where are, or ever were there any men in such a state of nature? To which it may suffice as an answer at present, that since all princes and rulers of independent governments all through the world, are in a state of nature, it is plain the world never was, nor ever will be, without numbers of men in that state. I have named all governors of independent communities, whether they are, or are not, in league with others: for it is not every compact that puts an end to the state of nature between men, but only this one of agreeing together mutually to enter into one community, and make one body politic; other promises, and compacts, men may make one with another, and yet still be in the state of nature. The promises and bargains for truck, &c. between the two men in the desert island, mentioned by Garcilasso de la Vega, in his history of Peru; or between a Swiss and an Indian, in the woods of America, are binding to them, though they are perfectly in a state of nature, in reference to one another: for truth and keeping of faith belongs to men, as men, and not as members of society.

Sect. 15. To those that say, there were never any men in the state of nature, I will not only oppose the authority of the judicious Hooker, Eccl. Pol. lib. i. sect. 10, where he says,

> The laws which have been hitherto mentioned, i.e. the laws of nature, do bind men absolutely, even as they are men, although they have never any settled fellowship, never any solemn agreement amongst themselves what to do, or not to do: but forasmuch as we are not by ourselves sufficient to furnish ourselves with competent store of things, needful for such a life as our nature doth desire, a life fit for the dignity of man; therefore to supply those defects and imperfections which are in us, as living single and solely by ourselves, we are naturally induced to seek communion and fellowship with others: this was the cause of men's uniting themselves at first in politic societies.

But I moreover affirm, that all men are naturally in that state, and remain so, till by their own consents they make themselves members of some politic society; and I doubt not in the sequel of this discourse, to make it very clear.

CHAPTER. III.

OF THE STATE OF WAR.

Sect. 16. THE state of war is a state of enmity and destruction: and therefore declaring by word or action, not a passionate and hasty, but a sedate settled design upon another man's life, puts him in a state of war with him against whom he has declared such an intention, and so has exposed his life to the other's power to be taken away by him, or any one that joins with him in his defence, and espouses his quarrel; it being reasonable and just, I should have a right to destroy that which threatens me with destruction: for, by the fundamental law of nature, man being to be preserved as much as possible, when all cannot be preserved, the safety of the innocent is to be preferred: and one may destroy a man who makes war upon him, or has discovered an enmity to his being, for the same reason that he may kill a wolf or a lion; because such men are not under the ties of the commonlaw of reason, have no other rule, but that of force and violence, and so may be treated as beasts of prey, those dangerous and noxious creatures, that will be sure to destroy him whenever he falls into their power.

Sect. 17. And hence it is, that he who attempts to get another man into his absolute power, does thereby put himself into a state of war with him; it being to be understood as a declaration of a design upon his life: for I have reason to conclude, that he who would get me into his power without my consent, would use me as he pleased when he had got me there, and destroy me too when he had a fancy to it; for no body can desire to have me in his absolute power, unless it be to compel me by force to that which is against the right of my freedom, i.e. make me a slave. To be free from such force is the only security of my preservation; and reason bids me look on him, as an enemy to my preservation, who would take away that freedom which is the fence to it; so that he who makes an attempt to enslave me, thereby puts himself into a state of war with me. He that, in the state of nature, would take away the freedom that belongs to any one in that state, must necessarily be supposed to have a design to take away every thing else, that freedom being the foundation of all the rest; as he that, in the state of society, would take away the freedom belonging to those of that society or commonwealth, must be supposed to design to take away from them every thing else, and so be looked on as in a state of war.

Sect. 18. This makes it lawful for a man to kill a thief, who has not in the least hurt him, nor declared any design upon his life, any farther than, by the use of force, so to get him in his power, as to take away his money, or what he pleases, from him; because using force, where he has no right, to get me into his power, let his pretence be what it will, I have no reason to suppose, that he, who would take away my liberty, would not, when he had me in his power, take away every thing else. And therefore it is lawful for me to treat him as one who has put himself into a state of war with me, i.e. kill him if I can; for to that hazard does he justly expose himself, whoever introduces a state of war, and is aggressor in it.

Sect. 19. And here we have the plain difference between the state of nature and the state of war, which however some men have confounded, are as far distant, as a state of peace, good will, mutual assistance and preservation, and a state of enmity, malice, violence and mutual destruction, are one from another. Men living together according to reason, without a common superior on earth, with authority to judge between them, is properly the state of nature. But force, or a declared design of force, upon the person of another, where there is no common superior on earth to appeal to for relief, is the state of war: and it is the want of such an appeal gives a man the right of war even against an aggressor, tho' he be in society and a fellow subject. Thus a thief, whom I cannot harm, but by appeal to the law, for having stolen all that I am worth, I may kill, when he sets on me to rob me but of my horse or coat; because the law, which was made for my preservation, where it cannot interpose to secure my life from present force, which, if lost, is capable of no reparation, permits me my own defence, and the right of war, a liberty to kill the aggressor, because the aggressor allows not time to appeal to our common judge, nor the decision of the law, for remedy in a case where the mischief may be irreparable. Want of a common judge with authority, puts all men in a state of nature: force without right, upon a man's person, makes a state of war, both where there is, and is not, a common judge.

Sect. 20. But when the actual force is over, the state of war ceases between those that are in society, and are equally on both sides subjected to the fair determination of the law; because then there lies open the remedy of appeal for the past injury, and to prevent future harm: but where no such appeal is, as in the state of nature, for want of positive laws, and judges with authority to appeal to, the state of war once begun, continues, with a right to the innocent party to destroy the other whenever he can, until the aggressor offers peace, and desires reconciliation on such terms as may repair any wrongs he has already done, and secure the innocent for the future; nay, where an appeal to the law, and constituted judges, lies open, but the remedy is denied by a manifest perverting of justice, and a barefaced wresting of the laws to protect or indemnify the violence or injuries of some men, or party of men, there it is hard to imagine any thing but a state of war: for wherever violence is used, and injury done, though by hands appointed to administer justice, it is still violence and injury, however coloured with the name, pretences, or forms of law, the end whereof being to protect and redress the innocent, by an unbiassed application of it, to all who are under it; wherever that is not bona fide done, war is made upon the sufferers, who having no appeal on earth to right them, they are left to the only remedy in such cases, an appeal to heaven.

Sect. 21. To avoid this state of war (wherein there is no appeal but to heaven, and wherein every the least difference is apt to end, where there is no authority to decide between the contenders) is one great reason of men's putting themselves into society, and quitting the state of nature: for where there is an authority, a power on earth, from which relief can be had by appeal, there the continuance of the state of war is excluded, and the controversy is decided by that power. Had there been any such court, any superior jurisdiction on earth, to determine the right between Jephtha and the Ammonites, they had never come to a state of war: but we see he was forced to appeal to heaven. The Lord the Judge (says he) be judge this day between the children of Israel and the children of Ammon, Judg. xi. 27. and then prosecuting, and relying on his appeal, he leads out his army to battle: and therefore in such controversies, where the question is put, who shall be judge? It cannot be meant, who shall decide the controversy; every one knows what Jephtha here tells us, that the Lord the Judge shall judge. Where there is no judge on earth, the appeal lies to God in heaven. That question then cannot mean, who shall judge, whether another hath put himself in a state of war with me, and whether I may, as Jephtha did, appeal to heaven in it? of that I myself can only be judge in my own conscience, as I will answer it, at the great day, to the supreme judge of all men.

CHAPTER. IV.

OF SLAVERY.

Sect. 22. THE natural liberty of man is to be free from any superior power on earth, and not to be under the will or legislative authority of man, but to have only the law of nature for his rule. The liberty of man, in society, is to be under no other legislative power, but that established, by consent, in the commonwealth; nor under the dominion of any will, or restraint of any law, but what that legislative shall enact, according to the trust put in it. Freedom then is not what Sir Robert Filmer tells us, Observations, A. 55. a liberty for every one to do what he lists, to live as he pleases, and not to be tied by any laws: but freedom of men under government is, to have a standing rule to live by, common to every one of that society, and made by the legislative power erected in it; a liberty to follow my own will in all things, where the rule prescribes not; and not to be subject to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary will of another man: as freedom of nature is, to be under no other restraint but the law of nature.

Sect. 23. This freedom from absolute, arbitrary power, is so necessary to, and closely joined with a man's preservation, that he cannot part with it, but by what forfeits his preservation and life together: for a man, not having the power of his own life, cannot, by compact, or his own consent, enslave himself to any one, nor put himself under the absolute, arbitrary power of another, to take away his life, when he pleases. No body can give more power than he has himself; and he that cannot take away his own life, cannot give another power over it. Indeed, having by his fault forfeited his own life, by some act that deserves death; he, to whom he has forfeited it, may (when he has him in his power) delay to take it, and make use of him to his own service, and he does him no injury by it: for, whenever he finds the hardship of his slavery outweigh the value of his life, it is in his power, by resisting the will of his master, to draw on himself the death he desires.

Sect. 24. This is the perfect condition of slavery, which is nothing else, but the state of war continued, between a lawful conqueror and a captive: for, if once compact enter between them, and make an agreement for a limited power on the one side, and obedience on the other, the state of war and slavery ceases, as long as the compact endures: for, as has been said, no man can, by agreement, pass over to another that which he hath not in himself, a power over his own life.

I confess, we find among the Jews, as well as other nations, that men did sell themselves; but, it is plain, this was only to drudgery, not to slavery: for, it is evident, the person sold was not under an absolute, arbitrary, despotical power: for the master could not have power to kill him, at any time, whom, at a certain time, he was obliged to let go free out of his service; and the master of such a servant was so far from having an arbitrary power over his life, that he could not, at pleasure, so much as maim him, but the loss of an eye, or tooth, set him free, Exod. xxi.

CHAPTER. V.

OF PROPERTY.

Sect. 25. Whether we consider natural reason, which tells us, that men, being once born, have a right to their preservation, and consequently to meat and drink, and such other things as nature affords for their subsistence: or revelation, which gives us an account of those grants God made of the world to Adam, and to Noah, and his sons, it is very clear, that God, as king David says, Psal. cxv. 16. has given the earth to the children of men; given it to mankind in common. But this being supposed, it seems to some a very great difficulty, how any one should ever come to have a property in any thing: I will not content myself to answer, that if it be difficult to make out property, upon a supposition that God gave the world to Adam, and his posterity in common, it is impossible that any man, but one universal monarch, should have any property upon a supposition, that God gave the world to Adam, and his heirs in succession, exclusive of all the rest of his posterity. But I shall endeavour to shew, how men might come to have a property in several parts of that which God gave to mankind in common, and that without any express compact of all the commoners.

Sect. 26. God, who hath given the world to men in common, hath also given them reason to make use of it to the best advantage of life, and convenience. The earth, and all that is therein, is given to men for the support and comfort of their being. And tho' all the fruits it naturally produces, and beasts it feeds, belong to mankind in common, as they are produced by the spontaneous hand of nature; and no body has originally a private dominion, exclusive of the rest of mankind, in any of them, as they are thus in their natural state: yet being given for the use of men, there must of necessity be a means to appropriate them some way or other, before they can be of any use, or at all beneficial to any particular man. The fruit, or venison, which nourishes the wild Indian, who knows no enclosure, and is still a tenant in common, must be his, and so his, i.e. a part of him, that another can no longer have any right to it, before it can do him any good for the support of his life.

Sect. 27. Though the earth, and all inferior creatures, be common to all men, yet every man has a property in his own person: this no body has any right to but himself. The labour of his body, and the work of his hands, we may say, are properly his. Whatsoever then he removes out of the state that nature hath provided, and left it in, he hath mixed his labour with, and joined to it something that is his own, and thereby makes it his property. It being by him removed from the common state nature hath placed it in, it hath by this labour something annexed to it, that excludes the common right of other men: for this labour being the unquestionable property of the labourer, no man but he can have a right to what that is once joined to, at least where there is enough, and as good, left in common for others.

Sect. 28. He that is nourished by the acorns he picked up under an oak, or the apples he gathered from the trees in the wood, has certainly appropriated them to himself. No body can deny but the nourishment is his. I ask then, when did they begin to be his? when he digested? or when he eat? or when he boiled? or when he brought them home? or when he picked them up? and it is plain, if the first gathering made them not his, nothing else could. That labour put a distinction between them and common: that added something to them more than nature, the common mother of all, had done; and so they became his private right. And will any one say, he had no right to those acorns or apples, he thus appropriated, because he had not the consent of all mankind to make them his? Was it a robbery thus to assume to himself what belonged to all in common? If such a consent as that was necessary, man had starved, notwithstanding the plenty God had given him. We see in commons, which remain so by compact, that it is the taking any part of what is common, and removing it out of the state nature leaves it in, which begins the property; without which the common is of no use. And the taking of this or that part, does not depend on the express consent of all the commoners. Thus the grass my horse has bit; the turfs my servant has cut; and the ore I have digged in any place, where I have a right to them in common with others, become my property, without the assignation or consent of any body. The labour that was mine, removing them out of that common state they were in, hath fixed my property in them.

Sect. 29. By making an explicit consent of every commoner, necessary to any one's appropriating to himself any part of what is given in common, children or servants could not cut the meat, which their father or master had provided for them in common, without assigning to every one his peculiar part. Though the water running in the fountain be every one's, yet who can doubt, but that in the pitcher is his only who drew it out? His labour hath taken it out of the hands of nature, where it was common, and belonged equally to all her children, and hath thereby appropriated it to himself.

Sect. 30. Thus this law of reason makes the deer that Indian's who hath killed it; it is allowed to be his goods, who hath bestowed his labour upon it, though before it was the common right of every one. And amongst those who are counted the civilized part of mankind, who have made and multiplied positive laws to determine property, this original law of nature, for the beginning of property, in what was before common, still takes place; and by virtue thereof, what fish any one catches in the ocean, that great and still remaining common of mankind; or what ambergrise any one takes up here, is by the labour that removes it out of that common state nature left it in, made his property, who takes that pains about it. And even amongst us, the hare that any one is hunting, is thought his who pursues her during the chase: for being a beast that is still looked upon as common, and no man's private possession; whoever has employed so much labour about any of that kind, as to find and pursue her, has thereby removed her from the state of nature, wherein she was common, and hath begun a property.

Sect. 31. It will perhaps be objected to this, that if gathering the acorns, or other fruits of the earth, &c. makes a right to them, then any one may ingross as much as he will. To which I answer, Not so. The same law of nature, that does by this means give us property, does also bound that property too. God has given us all things richly, 1 Tim. vi. 12. is the voice of reason confirmed by inspiration. But how far has he given it us? To enjoy. As much as any one can make use of to any advantage of life before it spoils, so much he may by his labour fix a property in: whatever is beyond this, is more than his share, and belongs to others. Nothing was made by God for man to spoil or destroy. And thus, considering the plenty of natural provisions there was a long time in the world, and the few spenders; and to how small a part of that provision the industry of one man could extend itself, and ingross it to the prejudice of others; especially keeping within the bounds, set by reason, of what might serve for his use; there could be then little room for quarrels or contentions about property so established.

Sect. 32. But the chief matter of property being now not the fruits of the earth, and the beasts that subsist on it, but the earth itself; as that which takes in and carries with it all the rest; I think it is plain, that property in that too is acquired as the former. As much land as a man tills, plants, improves, cultivates, and can use the product of, so much is his property. He by his labour does, as it were, inclose it from the common. Nor will it invalidate his right, to say every body else has an equal title to it; and therefore he cannot appropriate, he cannot inclose, without the consent of all his fellow-commoners, all mankind. God, when he gave the world in common to all mankind, commanded man also to labour, and the penury of his condition required it of him. God and his reason commanded him to subdue the earth, i.e. improve it for the benefit of life, and therein lay out something upon it that was his own, his labour. He that in obedience to this command of God, subdued, tilled and sowed any part of it, thereby annexed to it something that was his property, which another had no title to, nor could without injury take from him.

Sect. 33. Nor was this appropriation of any parcel of land, by improving it, any prejudice to any other man, since there was still enough, and as good left; and more than the yet unprovided could use. So that, in effect, there was never the less left for others because of his enclosure for himself: for he that leaves as much as another can make use of, does as good as take nothing at all. No body could think himself injured by the drinking of another man, though he took a good draught, who had a whole river of the same water left him to quench his thirst: and the case of land and water, where there is enough of both, is perfectly the same.

Sect. 34. God gave the world to men in common; but since he gave it them for their benefit, and the greatest conveniencies of life they were capable to draw from it, it cannot be supposed he meant it should always remain common and uncultivated. He gave it to the use of the industrious and rational, (and labour was to be his title to it;) not to the fancy or covetousness of the quarrelsome and contentious. He that had as good left for his improvement, as was already taken up, needed not complain, ought not to meddle with what was already improved by another's labour: if he did, it is plain he desired the benefit of another's pains, which he had no right to, and not the ground which God had given him in common with others to labour on, and whereof there was as good left, as that already possessed, and more than he knew what to do with, or his industry could reach to.

Sect. 35. It is true, in land that is common in England, or any other country, where there is plenty of people under government, who have money and commerce, no one can inclose or appropriate any part, without the consent of all his fellow-commoners; because this is left common by compact, i.e. by the law of the land, which is not to be violated. And though it be common, in respect of some men, it is not so to all mankind; but is the joint property of this country, or this parish. Besides, the remainder, after such enclosure, would not be as good to the rest of the commoners, as the whole was when they could all make use of the whole; whereas in the beginning and first peopling of the great common of the world, it was quite otherwise. The law man was under, was rather for appropriating. God commanded, and his wants forced him to labour. That was his property which could not be taken from him where-ever he had fixed it. And hence subduing or cultivating the earth, and having dominion, we see are joined together. The one gave title to the other. So that God, by commanding to subdue, gave authority so far to appropriate: and the condition of human life, which requires labour and materials to work on, necessarily introduces private possessions.

Sect. 36. The measure of property nature has well set by the extent of men's labour and the conveniencies of life: no man's labour could subdue, or appropriate all; nor could his enjoyment consume more than a small part; so that it was impossible for any man, this way, to intrench upon the right of another, or acquire to himself a property, to the prejudice of his neighbour, who would still have room for as good, and as large a possession (after the other had taken out his) as before it was appropriated. This measure did confine every man's possession to a very moderate proportion, and such as he might appropriate to himself, without injury to any body, in the first ages of the world, when men were more in danger to be lost, by wandering from their company, in the then vast wilderness of the earth, than to be straitened for want of room to plant in. And the same measure may be allowed still without prejudice to any body, as full as the world seems: for supposing a man, or family, in the state they were at first peopling of the world by the children of Adam, or Noah; let him plant in some inland, vacant places of America, we shall find that the possessions he could make himself, upon the measures we have given, would not be very large, nor, even to this day, prejudice the rest of mankind, or give them reason to complain, or think themselves injured by this man's incroachment, though the race of men have now spread themselves to all the corners of the world, and do infinitely exceed the small number was at the beginning. Nay, the extent of ground is of so little value, without labour, that I have heard it affirmed, that in Spain itself a man may be permitted to plough, sow and reap, without being disturbed, upon land he has no other title to, but only his making use of it. But, on the contrary, the inhabitants think themselves beholden to him, who, by his industry on neglected, and consequently waste land, has increased the stock of corn, which they wanted. But be this as it will, which I lay no stress on; this I dare boldly affirm, that the same rule of propriety, (viz.) that every man should have as much as he could make use of, would hold still in the world, without straitening any body; since there is land enough in the world to suffice double the inhabitants, had not the invention of money, and the tacit agreement of men to put a value on it, introduced (by consent) larger possessions, and a right to them; which, how it has done, I shall by and by shew more at large.

Sect. 37. This is certain, that in the beginning, before the desire of having more than man needed had altered the intrinsic value of things, which depends only on their usefulness to the life of man; or had agreed, that a little piece of yellow metal, which would keep without wasting or decay, should be worth a great piece of flesh, or a whole heap of corn; though men had a right to appropriate, by their labour, each one of himself, as much of the things of nature, as he could use: yet this could not be much, nor to the prejudice of others, where the same plenty was still left to those who would use the same industry. To which let me add, that he who appropriates land to himself by his labour, does not lessen, but increase the common stock of mankind: for the provisions serving to the support of human life, produced by one acre of inclosed and cultivated land, are (to speak much within compass) ten times more than those which are yielded by an acre of land of an equal richness lying waste in common. And therefore he that incloses land, and has a greater plenty of the conveniencies of life from ten acres, than he could have from an hundred left to nature, may truly be said to give ninety acres to mankind: for his labour now supplies him with provisions out of ten acres, which were but the product of an hundred lying in common. I have here rated the improved land very low, in making its product but as ten to one, when it is much nearer an hundred to one: for I ask, whether in the wild woods and uncultivated waste of America, left to nature, without any improvement, tillage or husbandry, a thousand acres yield the needy and wretched inhabitants as many conveniencies of life, as ten acres of equally fertile land do in Devonshire, where they are well cultivated?

Before the appropriation of land, he who gathered as much of the wild fruit, killed, caught, or tamed, as many of the beasts, as he could; he that so imployed his pains about any of the spontaneous products of nature, as any way to alter them from the state which nature put them in, by placing any of his labour on them, did thereby acquire a propriety in them: but if they perished, in his possession, without their due use; if the fruits rotted, or the venison putrified, before he could spend it, he offended against the common law of nature, and was liable to be punished; he invaded his neighbour's share, for he had no right, farther than his use called for any of them, and they might serve to afford him conveniencies of life.

Sect. 38. The same measures governed the possession of land too: whatsoever he tilled and reaped, laid up and made use of, before it spoiled, that was his peculiar right; whatsoever he enclosed, and could feed, and make use of, the cattle and product was also his. But if either the grass of his enclosure rotted on the ground, or the fruit of his planting perished without gathering, and laying up, this part of the earth, notwithstanding his enclosure, was still to be looked on as waste, and might be the possession of any other. Thus, at the beginning, Cain might take as much ground as he could till, and make it his own land, and yet leave enough to Abel's sheep to feed on; a few acres would serve for both their possessions. But as families increased, and industry inlarged their stocks, their possessions inlarged with the need of them; but yet it was commonly without any fixed property in the ground they made use of, till they incorporated, settled themselves together, and built cities; and then, by consent, they came in time, to set out the bounds of their distinct territories, and agree on limits between them and their neighbours; and by laws within themselves, settled the properties of those of the same society: for we see, that in that part of the world which was first inhabited, and therefore like to be best peopled, even as low down as Abraham's time, they wandered with their flocks, and their herds, which was their substance, freely up and down; and this Abraham did, in a country where he was a stranger. Whence it is plain, that at least a great part of the land lay in common; that the inhabitants valued it not, nor claimed property in any more than they made use of. But when there was not room enough in the same place, for their herds to feed together, they by consent, as Abraham and Lot did, Gen. xiii. 5. separated and inlarged their pasture, where it best liked them. And for the same reason Esau went from his father, and his brother, and planted in mount Seir, Gen. xxxvi. 6.

Sect. 39. And thus, without supposing any private dominion, and property in Adam, over all the world, exclusive of all other men, which can no way be proved, nor any one's property be made out from it; but supposing the world given, as it was, to the children of men in common, we see how labour could make men distinct titles to several parcels of it, for their private uses; wherein there could be no doubt of right, no room for quarrel.

Sect. 40. Nor is it so strange, as perhaps before consideration it may appear, that the property of labour should be able to over-balance the community of land: for it is labour indeed that puts the difference of value on every thing; and let any one consider what the difference is between an acre of land planted with tobacco or sugar, sown with wheat or barley, and an acre of the same land lying in common, without any husbandry upon it, and he will find, that the improvement of labour makes the far greater part of the value. I think it will be but a very modest computation to say, that of the products of the earth useful to the life of man nine tenths are the effects of labour: nay, if we will rightly estimate things as they come to our use, and cast up the several expences about them, what in them is purely owing to nature, and what to labour, we shall find, that in most of them ninety-nine hundredths are wholly to be put on the account of labour.

Sect. 41. There cannot be a clearer demonstration of any thing, than several nations of the Americans are of this, who are rich in land, and poor in all the comforts of life; whom nature having furnished as liberally as any other people, with the materials of plenty, i.e. a fruitful soil, apt to produce in abundance, what might serve for food, raiment, and delight; yet for want of improving it by labour, have not one hundredth part of the conveniencies we enjoy: and a king of a large and fruitful territory there, feeds, lodges, and is clad worse than a day-labourer in England.

Sect. 42. To make this a little clearer, let us but trace some of the ordinary provisions of life, through their several progresses, before they come to our use, and see how much they receive of their value from human industry. Bread, wine and cloth, are things of daily use, and great plenty; yet notwithstanding, acorns, water and leaves, or skins, must be our bread, drink and cloathing, did not labour furnish us with these more useful commodities: for whatever bread is more worth than acorns, wine than water, and cloth or silk, than leaves, skins or moss, that is wholly owing to labour and industry; the one of these being the food and raiment which unassisted nature furnishes us with; the other, provisions which our industry and pains prepare for us, which how much they exceed the other in value, when any one hath computed, he will then see how much labour makes the far greatest part of the value of things we enjoy in this world: and the ground which produces the materials, is scarce to be reckoned in, as any, or at most, but a very small part of it; so little, that even amongst us, land that is left wholly to nature, that hath no improvement of pasturage, tillage, or planting, is called, as indeed it is, waste; and we shall find the benefit of it amount to little more than nothing.

This shews how much numbers of men are to be preferred to largeness of dominions; and that the increase of lands, and the right employing of them, is the great art of government: and that prince, who shall be so wise and godlike, as by established laws of liberty to secure protection and encouragement to the honest industry of mankind, against the oppression of power and narrowness of party, will quickly be too hard for his neighbours: but this by the by.

To return to the argument in hand.

Sect. 43. An acre of land, that bears here twenty bushels of wheat, and another in America, which, with the same husbandry, would do the like, are, without doubt, of the same natural intrinsic value: but yet the benefit mankind receives from the one in a year, is worth 5l. and from the other possibly not worth a penny, if all the profit an Indian received from it were to be valued, and sold here; at least, I may truly say, not one thousandth. It is labour then which puts the greatest part of value upon land, without which it would scarcely be worth any thing: it is to that we owe the greatest part of all its useful products; for all that the straw, bran, bread, of that acre of wheat, is more worth than the product of an acre of as good land, which lies waste, is all the effect of labour: for it is not barely the plough-man's pains, the reaper's and thresher's toil, and the baker's sweat, is to be counted into the bread we eat; the labour of those who broke the oxen, who digged and wrought the iron and stones, who felled and framed the timber employed about the plough, mill, oven, or any other utensils, which are a vast number, requisite to this corn, from its being feed to be sown to its being made bread, must all be charged on the account of labour, and received as an effect of that: nature and the earth furnished only the almost worthless materials, as in themselves. It would be a strange catalogue of things, that industry provided and made use of, about every loaf of bread, before it came to our use, if we could trace them; iron, wood, leather, bark, timber, stone, bricks, coals, lime, cloth, dying drugs, pitch, tar, masts, ropes, and all the materials made use of in the ship, that brought any of the commodities made use of by any of the workmen, to any part of the work; all which it would be almost impossible, at least too long, to reckon up.

Sect. 44. From all which it is evident, that though the things of nature are given in common, yet man, by being master of himself, and proprietor of his own person, and the actions or labour of it, had still in himself the great foundation of property; and that, which made up the great part of what he applied to the support or comfort of his being, when invention and arts had improved the conveniencies of life, was perfectly his own, and did not belong in common to others.

Sect. 45. Thus labour, in the beginning, gave a right of property, wherever any one was pleased to employ it upon what was common, which remained a long while the far greater part, and is yet more than mankind makes use of. Men, at first, for the most part, contented themselves with what unassisted nature offered to their necessities: and though afterwards, in some parts of the world, (where the increase of people and stock, with the use of money, had made land scarce, and so of some value) the several communities settled the bounds of their distinct territories, and by laws within themselves regulated the properties of the private men of their society, and so, by compact and agreement, settled the property which labour and industry began; and the leagues that have been made between several states and kingdoms, either expresly or tacitly disowning all claim and right to the land in the others possession, have, by common consent, given up their pretences to their natural common right, which originally they had to those countries, and so have, by positive agreement, settled a property amongst themselves, in distinct parts and parcels of the earth; yet there are still great tracts of ground to be found, which (the inhabitants thereof not having joined with the rest of mankind, in the consent of the use of their common money) lie waste, and are more than the people who dwell on it do, or can make use of, and so still lie in common; tho' this can scarce happen amongst that part of mankind that have consented to the use of money.

Sect. 46. The greatest part of things really useful to the life of man, and such as the necessity of subsisting made the first commoners of the world look after, as it doth the Americans now, are generally things of short duration; such as, if they are not consumed by use, will decay and perish of themselves: gold, silver and diamonds, are things that fancy or agreement hath put the value on, more than real use, and the necessary support of life. Now of those good things which nature hath provided in common, every one had a right (as hath been said) to as much as he could use, and property in all that he could effect with his labour; all that his industry could extend to, to alter from the state nature had put it in, was his. He that gathered a hundred bushels of acorns or apples, had thereby a property in them, they were his goods as soon as gathered. He was only to look, that he used them before they spoiled, else he took more than his share, and robbed others. And indeed it was a foolish thing, as well as dishonest, to hoard up more than he could make use of. If he gave away a part to any body else, so that it perished not uselesly in his possession, these he also made use of. And if he also bartered away plums, that would have rotted in a week, for nuts that would last good for his eating a whole year, he did no injury; he wasted not the common stock; destroyed no part of the portion of goods that belonged to others, so long as nothing perished uselesly in his hands. Again, if he would give his nuts for a piece of metal, pleased with its colour; or exchange his sheep for shells, or wool for a sparkling pebble or a diamond, and keep those by him all his life he invaded not the right of others, he might heap up as much of these durable things as he pleased; the exceeding of the bounds of his just property not lying in the largeness of his possession, but the perishing of any thing uselesly in it.

Sect. 47. And thus came in the use of money, some lasting thing that men might keep without spoiling, and that by mutual consent men would take in exchange for the truly useful, but perishable supports of life.

Sect. 48. And as different degrees of industry were apt to give men possessions in different proportions, so this invention of money gave them the opportunity to continue and enlarge them: for supposing an island, separate from all possible commerce with the rest of the world, wherein there were but an hundred families, but there were sheep, horses and cows, with other useful animals, wholsome fruits, and land enough for corn for a hundred thousand times as many, but nothing in the island, either because of its commonness, or perishableness, fit to supply the place of money; what reason could any one have there to enlarge his possessions beyond the use of his family, and a plentiful supply to its consumption, either in what their own industry produced, or they could barter for like perishable, useful commodities, with others? Where there is not some thing, both lasting and scarce, and so valuable to be hoarded up, there men will not be apt to enlarge their possessions of land, were it never so rich, never so free for them to take: for I ask, what would a man value ten thousand, or an hundred thousand acres of excellent land, ready cultivated, and well stocked too with cattle, in the middle of the inland parts of America, where he had no hopes of commerce with other parts of the world, to draw money to him by the sale of the product? It would not be worth the enclosing, and we should see him give up again to the wild common of nature, whatever was more than would supply the conveniencies of life to be had there for him and his family.

Sect. 49. Thus in the beginning all the world was America, and more so than that is now; for no such thing as money was any where known. Find out something that hath the use and value of money amongst his neighbours, you shall see the same man will begin presently to enlarge his possessions.

Sect. 50. But since gold and silver, being little useful to the life of man in proportion to food, raiment, and carriage, has its value only from the consent of men, whereof labour yet makes, in great part, the measure, it is plain, that men have agreed to a disproportionate and unequal possession of the earth, they having, by a tacit and voluntary consent, found out, a way how a man may fairly possess more land than he himself can use the product of, by receiving in exchange for the overplus gold and silver, which may be hoarded up without injury to any one; these metals not spoiling or decaying in the hands of the possessor. This partage of things in an inequality of private possessions, men have made practicable out of the bounds of society, and without compact, only by putting a value on gold and silver, and tacitly agreeing in the use of money: for in governments, the laws regulate the right of property, and the possession of land is determined by positive constitutions.

Sect. 51. And thus, I think, it is very easy to conceive, without any difficulty, how labour could at first begin a title of property in the common things of nature, and how the spending it upon our uses bounded it. So that there could then be no reason of quarrelling about title, nor any doubt about the largeness of possession it gave. Right and conveniency went together; for as a man had a right to all he could employ his labour upon, so he had no temptation to labour for more than he could make use of. This left no room for controversy about the title, nor for encroachment on the right of others; what portion a man carved to himself, was easily seen; and it was useless, as well as dishonest, to carve himself too much, or take more than he needed.

CHAPTER. VI.

OF PATERNAL POWER.

Sect. 52. IT may perhaps be censured as an impertinent criticism, in a discourse of this nature, to find fault with words and names, that have obtained in the world: and yet possibly it may not be amiss to offer new ones, when the old are apt to lead men into mistakes, as this of paternal power probably has done, which seems so to place the power of parents over their children wholly in the father, as if the mother had no share in it; whereas, if we consult reason or revelation, we shall find, she hath an equal title. This may give one reason to ask, whether this might not be more properly called parental power? for whatever obligation nature and the right of generation lays on children, it must certainly bind them equal to both the concurrent causes of it. And accordingly we see the positive law of God every where joins them together, without distinction, when it commands the obedience of children, Honour thy father and thy mother, Exod. xx. 12. Whosoever curseth his father or his mother, Lev. xx. 9. Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father, Lev. xix. 3. Children, obey your parents, &c. Eph. vi. 1. is the stile of the Old and New Testament.

Sect. 53. Had but this one thing been well considered, without looking any deeper into the matter, it might perhaps have kept men from running into those gross mistakes, they have made, about this power of parents; which, however it might, without any great harshness, bear the name of absolute dominion, and regal authority, when under the title of paternal power it seemed appropriated to the father, would yet have founded but oddly, and in the very name shewn the absurdity, if this supposed absolute power over children had been called parental; and thereby have discovered, that it belonged to the mother too: for it will but very ill serve the turn of those men, who contend so much for the absolute power and authority of the fatherhood, as they call it, that the mother should have any share in it; and it would have but ill supported the monarchy they contend for, when by the very name it appeared, that that fundamental authority, from whence they would derive their government of a single person only, was not placed in one, but two persons jointly. But to let this of names pass.

Sect. 54. Though I have said above, Chap. II. That all men by nature are equal, I cannot be supposed to understand all sorts of equality: age or virtue may give men a just precedency: excellency of parts and merit may place others above the common level: birth may subject some, and alliance or benefits others, to pay an observance to those to whom nature, gratitude, or other respects, may have made it due: and yet all this consists with the equality, which all men are in, in respect of jurisdiction or dominion one over another; which was the equality I there spoke of, as proper to the business in hand, being that equal right, that every man hath, to his natural freedom, without being subjected to the will or authority of any other man.

Sect. 55. Children, I confess, are not born in this full state of equality, though they are born to it. Their parents have a sort of rule and jurisdiction over them, when they come into the world, and for some time after; but it is but a temporary one. The bonds of this subjection are like the swaddling clothes they are wrapt up in, and supported by, in the weakness of their infancy: age and reason as they grow up, loosen them, till at length they drop quite off, and leave a man at his own free disposal.

Sect. 56. Adam was created a perfect man, his body and mind in full possession of their strength and reason, and so was capable, from the first instant of his being to provide for his own support and preservation, and govern his actions according to the dictates of the law of reason which God had implanted in him. From him the world is peopled with his descendants, who are all born infants, weak and helpless, without knowledge or understanding: but to supply the defects of this imperfect state, till the improvement of growth and age hath removed them, Adam and Eve, and after them all parents were, by the law of nature, under an obligation to preserve, nourish, and educate the children they had begotten; not as their own workmanship, but the workmanship of their own maker, the Almighty, to whom they were to be accountable for them.

Sect. 57. The law, that was to govern Adam, was the same that was to govern all his posterity, the law of reason. But his offspring having another way of entrance into the world, different from him, by a natural birth, that produced them ignorant and without the use of reason, they were not presently under that law; for no body can be under a law, which is not promulgated to him; and this law being promulgated or made known by reason only, he that is not come to the use of his reason, cannot be said to be under this law; and Adam's children, being not presently as soon as born under this law of reason, were not presently free: for law, in its true notion, is not so much the limitation as the direction of a free and intelligent agent to his proper interest, and prescribes no farther than is for the general good of those under that law: could they be happier without it, the law, as an useless thing, would of itself vanish; and that ill deserves the name of confinement which hedges us in only from bogs and precipices. So that, however it may be mistaken, the end of law is not to abolish or restrain, but to preserve and enlarge freedom: for in all the states of created beings capable of laws, where there is no law, there is no freedom: for liberty is, to be free from restraint and violence from others; which cannot be, where there is no law: but freedom is not, as we are told, a liberty for every man to do what he lists: (for who could be free, when every other man's humour might domineer over him?) but a liberty to dispose, and order as he lists, his person, actions, possessions, and his whole property, within the allowance of those laws under which he is, and therein not to be subject to the arbitrary will of another, but freely follow his own.

Sect. 58. The power, then, that parents have over their children, arises from that duty which is incumbent on them, to take care of their off-spring, during the imperfect state of childhood. To inform the mind, and govern the actions of their yet ignorant nonage, till reason shall take its place, and ease them of that trouble, is what the children want, and the parents are bound to: for God having given man an understanding to direct his actions, has allowed him a freedom of will, and liberty of acting, as properly belonging thereunto, within the bounds of that law he is under. But whilst he is in an estate, wherein he has not understanding of his own to direct his will, he is not to have any will of his own to follow: he that understands for him, must will for him too; he must prescribe to his will, and regulate his actions; but when he comes to the estate that made his father a freeman, the son is a freeman too.

Sect. 59. This holds in all the laws a man is under, whether natural or civil. Is a man under the law of nature? What made him free of that law? what gave him a free disposing of his property, according to his own will, within the compass of that law? I answer, a state of maturity wherein he might be supposed capable to know that law, that so he might keep his actions within the bounds of it. When he has acquired that state, he is presumed to know how far that law is to be his guide, and how far he may make use of his freedom, and so comes to have it; till then, some body else must guide him, who is presumed to know how far the law allows a liberty. If such a state of reason, such an age of discretion made him free, the same shall make his son free too. Is a man under the law of England? What made him free of that law? that is, to have the liberty to dispose of his actions and possessions according to his own will, within the permission of that law? A capacity of knowing that law; which is supposed by that law, at the age of one and twenty years, and in some cases sooner. If this made the father free, it shall make the son free too. Till then we see the law allows the son to have no will, but he is to be guided by the will of his father or guardian, who is to understand for him. And if the father die, and fail to substitute a deputy in his trust; if he hath not provided a tutor, to govern his son, during his minority, during his want of understanding, the law takes care to do it; some other must govern him, and be a will to him, till he hath attained to a state of freedom, and his understanding be fit to take the government of his will. But after that, the father and son are equally free as much as tutor and pupil after nonage; equally subjects of the same law together, without any dominion left in the father over the life, liberty, or estate of his son, whether they be only in the state and under the law of nature, or under the positive laws of an established government.

Sect. 60. But if, through defects that may happen out of the ordinary course of nature, any one comes not to such a degree of reason, wherein he might be supposed capable of knowing the law, and so living within the rules of it, he is never capable of being a free man, he is never let loose to the disposure of his own will (because he knows no bounds to it, has not understanding, its proper guide) but is continued under the tuition and government of others, all the time his own understanding is uncapable of that charge. And so lunatics and ideots are never set free from the government of their parents; > children, who are not as yet come unto those years whereat they may have; and innocents which are excluded by a natural defect from ever having; thirdly, madmen, which for the present cannot possibly have the use of right reason to guide themselves, have for their guide, the reason that guideth other men which are tutors over them, to seek and procure their good for them, says Hooker, Eccl. Pol. lib. i. sec. 7. All which seems no more than that duty, which God and nature has laid on man, as well as other creatures, to preserve their offspring, till they can be able to shift for themselves, and will scarce amount to an instance or proof of parents regal authority.

Sect. 61. Thus we are born free, as we are born rational; not that we have actually the exercise of either: age, that brings one, brings with it the other too. And thus we see how natural freedom and subjection to parents may consist together, and are both founded on the same principle. A child is free by his father's title, by his father's understanding, which is to govern him till he hath it of his own. The freedom of a man at years of discretion, and the subjection of a child to his parents, whilst yet short of that age, are so consistent, and so distinguishable, that the most blinded contenders for monarchy, by right of fatherhood, cannot miss this difference; the most obstinate cannot but allow their consistency: for were their doctrine all true, were the right heir of Adam now known, and by that title settled a monarch in his throne, invested with all the absolute unlimited power Sir Robert Filmer talks of; if he should die as soon as his heir were born, must not the child, notwithstanding he were never so free, never so much sovereign, be in subjection to his mother and nurse, to tutors and governors, till age and education brought him reason and ability to govern himself and others? The necessities of his life, the health of his body, and the information of his mind, would require him to be directed by the will of others, and not his own; and yet will any one think, that this restraint and subjection were inconsistent with, or spoiled him of that liberty or sovereignty he had a right to, or gave away his empire to those who had the government of his nonage? This government over him only prepared him the better and sooner for it. If any body should ask me, when my son is of age to be free? I shall answer, just when his monarch is of age to govern. But at what time, says the judicious Hooker, Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 6. a man may be said to have attained so far forth the use of reason, as sufficeth to make him capable of those laws whereby he is then bound to guide his actions: this is a great deal more easy for sense to discern, than for any one by skill and learning to determine.

Sect. 62. Common-wealths themselves take notice of, and allow, that there is a time when men are to begin to act like free men, and therefore till that time require not oaths of fealty, or allegiance, or other public owning of, or submission to the government of their countries.

Sect. 63. The freedom then of man, and liberty of acting according to his own will, is grounded on his having reason, which is able to instruct him in that law he is to govern himself by, and make him know how far he is left to the freedom of his own will. To turn him loose to an unrestrained liberty, before he has reason to guide him, is not the allowing him the privilege of his nature to be free; but to thrust him out amongst brutes, and abandon him to a state as wretched, and as much beneath that of a man, as their's. This is that which puts the authority into the parents hands to govern the minority of their children. God hath made it their business to employ this care on their offspring, and hath placed in them suitable inclinations of tenderness and concern to temper this power, to apply it, as his wisdom designed it, to the children's good, as long as they should need to be under it.

Sect. 64. But what reason can hence advance this care of the parents due to their off-spring into an absolute arbitrary dominion of the father, whose power reaches no farther, than by such a discipline, as he finds most effectual, to give such strength and health to their bodies, such vigour and rectitude to their minds, as may best fit his children to be most useful to themselves and others; and, if it be necessary to his condition, to make them work, when they are able, for their own subsistence. But in this power the mother too has her share with the father.

Sect. 65. Nay, this power so little belongs to the father by any peculiar right of nature, but only as he is guardian of his children, that when he quits his care of them, he loses his power over them, which goes along with their nourishment and education, to which it is inseparably annexed; and it belongs as much to the foster-father of an exposed child, as to the natural father of another. So little power does the bare act of begetting give a man over his issue; if all his care ends there, and this be all the title he hath to the name and authority of a father. And what will become of this paternal power in that part of the world, where one woman hath more than one husband at a time? or in those parts of America, where, when the husband and wife part, which happens frequently, the children are all left to the mother, follow her, and are wholly under her care and provision? If the father die whilst the children are young, do they not naturally every where owe the same obedience to their mother, during their minority, as to their father were he alive? and will any one say, that the mother hath a legislative power over her children? that she can make standing rules, which shall be of perpetual obligation, by which they ought to regulate all the concerns of their property, and bound their liberty all the course of their lives? or can she inforce the observation of them with capital punishments? for this is the proper power of the magistrate, of which the father hath not so much as the shadow. His command over his children is but temporary, and reaches not their life or property: it is but a help to the weakness and imperfection of their nonage, a discipline necessary to their education: and though a father may dispose of his own possessions as he pleases, when his children are out of danger of perishing for want, yet his power extends not to the lives or goods, which either their own industry, or another's bounty has made their's; nor to their liberty neither, when they are once arrived to the infranchisement of the years of discretion. The father's empire then ceases, and he can from thence forwards no more dispose of the liberty of his son, than that of any other man: and it must be far from an absolute or perpetual jurisdiction, from which a man may withdraw himself, having license from divine authority to leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife.

Sect. 66. But though there be a time when a child comes to be as free from subjection to the will and command of his father, as the father himself is free from subjection to the will of any body else, and they are each under no other restraint, but that which is common to them both, whether it be the law of nature, or municipal law of their country; yet this freedom exempts not a son from that honour which he ought, by the law of God and nature, to pay his parents. God having made the parents instruments in his great design of continuing the race of mankind, and the occasions of life to their children; as he hath laid on them an obligation to nourish, preserve, and bring up their offspring; so he has laid on the children a perpetual obligation of honouring their parents, which containing in it an inward esteem and reverence to be shewn by all outward expressions, ties up the child from any thing that may ever injure or affront, disturb or endanger, the happiness or life of those from whom he received his; and engages him in all actions of defence, relief, assistance and comfort of those, by whose means he entered into being, and has been made capable of any enjoyments of life: from this obligation no state, no freedom can absolve children. But this is very far from giving parents a power of command over their children, or an authority to make laws and dispose as they please of their lives or liberties. It is one thing to owe honour, respect, gratitude and assistance; another to require an absolute obedience and submission. The honour due to parents, a monarch in his throne owes his mother; and yet this lessens not his authority, nor subjects him to her government.

Sect. 67. The subjection of a minor places in the father a temporary government, which terminates with the minority of the child: and the honour due from a child, places in the parents a perpetual right to respect, reverence, support and compliance too, more or less, as the father's care, cost, and kindness in his education, has been more or less. This ends not with minority, but holds in all parts and conditions of a man's life. The want of distinguishing these two powers, viz. that which the father hath in the right of tuition, during minority, and the right of honour all his life, may perhaps have caused a great part of the mistakes about this matter: for to speak properly of them, the first of these is rather the privilege of children, and duty of parents, than any prerogative of paternal power. The nourishment and education of their children is a charge so incumbent on parents for their children's good, that nothing can absolve them from taking care of it: and though the power of commanding and chastising them go along with it, yet God hath woven into the principles of human nature such a tenderness for their off-spring, that there is little fear that parents should use their power with too much rigour; the excess is seldom on the severe side, the strong byass of nature drawing the other way. And therefore God almighty when he would express his gentle dealing with the Israelites, he tells them, that though he chastened them, he chastened them as a man chastens his son, Deut. viii. 5. i.e. with tenderness and affection, and kept them under no severer discipline than what was absolutely best for them, and had been less kindness to have slackened. This is that power to which children are commanded obedience, that the pains and care of their parents may not be increased, or ill rewarded.

Sect. 68. On the other side, honour and support, all that which gratitude requires to return for the benefits received by and from them, is the indispensable duty of the child, and the proper privilege of the parents. This is intended for the parents advantage, as the other is for the child's; though education, the parents duty, seems to have most power, because the ignorance and infirmities of childhood stand in need of restraint and correction; which is a visible exercise of rule, and a kind of dominion. And that duty which is comprehended in the word honour, requires less obedience, though the obligation be stronger on grown, than younger children: for who can think the command, Children obey your parents, requires in a man, that has children of his own, the same submission to his father, as it does in his yet young children to him; and that by this precept he were bound to obey all his father's commands, if, out of a conceit of authority, he should have the indiscretion to treat him still as a boy?

Sect. 69. The first part then of paternal power, or rather duty, which is education, belongs so to the father, that it terminates at a certain season; when the business of education is over, it ceases of itself, and is also alienable before: for a man may put the tuition of his son in other hands; and he that has made his son an apprentice to another, has discharged him, during that time, of a great part of his obedience both to himself and to his mother. But all the duty of honour, the other part, remains never the less entire to them; nothing can cancel that: it is so inseparable from them both, that the father's authority cannot dispossess the mother of this right, nor can any man discharge his son from honouring her that bore him. But both these are very far from a power to make laws, and enforcing them with penalties, that may reach estate, liberty, limbs and life. The power of commanding ends with nonage; and though, after that, honour and respect, support and defence, and whatsoever gratitude can oblige a man to, for the highest benefits he is naturally capable of, be always due from a son to his parents; yet all this puts no scepter into the father's hand, no sovereign power of commanding. He has no dominion over his son's property, or actions; nor any right, that his will should prescribe to his son's in all things; however it may become his son in many things, not very inconvenient to him and his family, to pay a deference to it.

Sect. 70. A man may owe honour and respect to an ancient, or wise man; defence to his child or friend; relief and support to the distressed; and gratitude to a benefactor, to such a degree, that all he has, all he can do, cannot sufficiently pay it: but all these give no authority, no right to any one, of making laws over him from whom they are owing. And it is plain, all this is due not only to the bare title of father; not only because, as has been said, it is owing to the mother too; but because these obligations to parents, and the degrees of what is required of children, may be varied by the different care and kindness, trouble and expence, which is often employed upon one child more than another.

Sect. 71. This shews the reason how it comes to pass, that parents in societies, where they themselves are subjects, retain a power over their children, and have as much right to their subjection, as those who are in the state of nature. Which could not possibly be, if all political power were only paternal, and that in truth they were one and the same thing: for then, all paternal power being in the prince, the subject could naturally have none of it. But these two powers, political and paternal, are so perfectly distinct and separate; are built upon so different foundations, and given to so different ends, that every subject that is a father, has as much a paternal power over his children, as the prince has over his: and every prince, that has parents, owes them as much filial duty and obedience, as the meanest of his subjects do to their's; and can therefore contain not any part or degree of that kind of dominion, which a prince or magistrate has over his subject.

Sect. 72. Though the obligation on the parents to bring up their children, and the obligation on children to honour their parents, contain all the power on the one hand, and submission on the other, which are proper to this relation, yet there is another power ordinarily in the father, whereby he has a tie on the obedience of his children; which tho' it be common to him with other men, yet the occasions of shewing it, almost constantly happening to fathers in their private families, and the instances of it elsewhere being rare, and less taken notice of, it passes in the world for a part of paternal jurisdiction. And this is the power men generally have to bestow their estates on those who please them best; the possession of the father being the expectation and inheritance of the children, ordinarily in certain proportions, according to the law and custom of each country; yet it is commonly in the father's power to bestow it with a more sparing or liberal hand, according as the behaviour of this or that child hath comported with his will and humour.

Sect. 73. This is no small tie on the obedience of children: and there being always annexed to the enjoyment of land, a submission to the government of the country, of which that land is a part; it has been commonly supposed, that a father could oblige his posterity to that government, of which he himself was a subject, and that his compact held them; whereas, it being only a necessary condition annexed to the land, and the inheritance of an estate which is under that government, reaches only those who will take it on that condition, and so is no natural tie or engagement, but a voluntary submission: for every man's children being by nature as free as himself, or any of his ancestors ever were, may, whilst they are in that freedom, choose what society they will join themselves to, what commonwealth they will put themselves under. But if they will enjoy the inheritance of their ancestors, they must take it on the same terms their ancestors had it, and submit to all the conditions annexed to such a possession. By this power indeed fathers oblige their children to obedience to themselves, even when they are past minority, and most commonly too subject them to this or that political power: but neither of these by any peculiar right of fatherhood, but by the reward they have in their hands to inforce and recompence such a compliance; and is no more power than what a French man has over an English man, who by the hopes of an estate he will leave him, will certainly have a strong tie on his obedience: and if, when it is left him, he will enjoy it, he must certainly take it upon the conditions annexed to the possession of land in that country where it lies, whether it be France or England.

Sect. 74. To conclude then, tho' the father's power of commanding extends no farther than the minority of his children, and to a degree only fit for the discipline and government of that age; and tho' that honour and respect, and all that which the Latins called piety, which they indispensably owe to their parents all their life-time, and in all estates, with all that support and defence is due to them, gives the father no power of governing, i.e. making laws and enacting penalties on his children; though by all this he has no dominion over the property or actions of his son: yet it is obvious to conceive how easy it was, in the first ages of the world, and in places still, where the thinness of people gives families leave to separate into unpossessed quarters, and they have room to remove or plant themselves in yet vacant habitations, for the father of the family to become the prince of it;* he had been a ruler from the beginning of the infancy of his children: and since without some government it would be hard for them to live together, it was likeliest it should, by the express or tacit consent of the children when they were grown up, be in the father, where it seemed without any change barely to continue; when indeed nothing more was required to it, than the permitting the father to exercise alone, in his family, that executive power of the law of nature, which every free man naturally hath, and by that permission resigning up to him a monarchical power, whilst they remained in it. But that this was not by any paternal right, but only by the consent of his children, is evident from hence, that no body doubts, but if a stranger, whom chance or business had brought to his family, had there killed any of his children, or committed any other fact, he might condemn and put him to death, or other-wise have punished him, as well as any of his children; which it was impossible he should do by virtue of any paternal authority over one who was not his child, but by virtue of that executive power of the law of nature, which, as a man, he had a right to: and he alone could punish him in his family, where the respect of his children had laid by the exercise of such a power, to give way to the dignity and authority they were willing should remain in him, above the rest of his family.

(*It is no improbable opinion therefore, which the archphilosopher was of, that the chief person in every houshold was always, as it were, a king: so when numbers of housholds joined themselves in civil societies together, kings were the first kind of governors amongst them, which is also, as it seemeth, the reason why the name of fathers continued still in them, who, of fathers, were made rulers; as also the ancient custom of governors to do as Melchizedec, and being kings, to exercise the office of priests, which fathers did at the first, grew perhaps by the same occasion. Howbeit, this is not the only kind of regiment that has been received in the world. The inconveniences of one kind have caused sundry others to be devised; so that in a word, all public regiment, of what kind soever, seemeth evidently to have risen from the deliberate advice, consultation and composition between men, judging it convenient and behoveful; there being no impossibility in nature considered by itself, but that man might have lived without any public regiment, Hooker's Eccl. Pol. lib. i. sect. 10.)

Sect. 75. Thus it was easy, and almost natural for children, by a tacit, and scarce avoidable consent, to make way for the father's authority and government. They had been accustomed in their childhood to follow his direction, and to refer their little differences to him, and when they were men, who fitter to rule them? Their little properties, and less covetousness, seldom afforded greater controversies; and when any should arise, where could they have a fitter umpire than he, by whose care they had every one been sustained and brought up, and who had a tenderness for them all? It is no wonder that they made no distinction betwixt minority and full age; nor looked after one and twenty, or any other age that might make them the free disposers of themselves and fortunes, when they could have no desire to be out of their pupilage: the government they had been under, during it, continued still to be more their protection than restraint; and they could no where find a greater security to their peace, liberties, and fortunes, than in the rule of a father.

Sect. 76. Thus the natural fathers of families, by an insensible change, became the politic monarchs of them too: and as they chanced to live long, and leave able and worthy heirs, for several successions, or otherwise; so they laid the foundations of hereditary, or elective kingdoms, under several constitutions and manners, according as chance, contrivance, or occasions happened to mould them. But if princes have their titles in their fathers right, and it be a sufficient proof of the natural right of fathers to political authority, because they commonly were those in whose hands we find, de facto, the exercise of government: I say, if this argument be good, it will as strongly prove, that all princes, nay princes only, ought to be priests, since it is as certain, that in the beginning, the father of the family was priest, as that he was ruler in his own houshold.

CHAPTER. VII.

OF POLITICAL OR CIVIL SOCIETY.

Sect. 77. GOD having made man such a creature, that in his own judgment, it was not good for him to be alone, put him under strong obligations of necessity, convenience, and inclination to drive him into society, as well as fitted him with understanding and language to continue and enjoy it. The first society was between man and wife, which gave beginning to that between parents and children; to which, in time, that between master and servant came to be added: and though all these might, and commonly did meet together, and make up but one family, wherein the master or mistress of it had some sort of rule proper to a family; each of these, or all together, came short of political society, as we shall see, if we consider the different ends, ties, and bounds of each of these.

Sect. 78. Conjugal society is made by a voluntary compact between man and woman; and tho' it consist chiefly in such a communion and right in one another's bodies as is necessary to its chief end, procreation; yet it draws with it mutual support and assistance, and a communion of interests too, as necessary not only to unite their care and affection, but also necessary to their common off-spring, who have a right to be nourished, and maintained by them, till they are able to provide for themselves.

Sect. 79. For the end of conjunction, between male and female, being not barely procreation, but the continuation of the species; this conjunction betwixt male and female ought to last, even after procreation, so long as is necessary to the nourishment and support of the young ones, who are to be sustained by those that got them, till they are able to shift and provide for themselves. This rule, which the infinite wise maker hath set to the works of his hands, we find the inferior creatures steadily obey. In those viviparous animals which feed on grass, the conjunction between male and female lasts no longer than the very act of copulation; because the teat of the dam being sufficient to nourish the young, till it be able to feed on grass, the male only begets, but concerns not himself for the female or young, to whose sustenance he can contribute nothing. But in beasts of prey the conjunction lasts longer: because the dam not being able well to subsist herself, and nourish her numerous off-spring by her own prey alone, a more laborious, as well as more dangerous way of living, than by feeding on grass, the assistance of the male is necessary to the maintenance of their common family, which cannot subsist till they are able to prey for themselves, but by the joint care of male and female. The same is to be observed in all birds, (except some domestic ones, where plenty of food excuses the cock from feeding, and taking care of the young brood) whose young needing food in the nest, the cock and hen continue mates, till the young are able to use their wing, and provide for themselves.

Sect. 80. And herein I think lies the chief, if not the only reason, why the male and female in mankind are tied to a longer conjunction than other creatures, viz. because the female is capable of conceiving, and de facto is commonly with child again, and brings forth too a new birth, long before the former is out of a dependency for support on his parents help, and able to shift for himself, and has all the assistance is due to him from his parents: whereby the father, who is bound to take care for those he hath begot, is under an obligation to continue in conjugal society with the same woman longer than other creatures, whose young being able to subsist of themselves, before the time of procreation returns again, the conjugal bond dissolves of itself, and they are at liberty, till Hymen at his usual anniversary season summons them again to chuse new mates. Wherein one cannot but admire the wisdom of the great Creator, who having given to man foresight, and an ability to lay up for the future, as well as to supply the present necessity, hath made it necessary, that society of man and wife should be more lasting, than of male and female amongst other creatures; that so their industry might be encouraged, and their interest better united, to make provision and lay up goods for their common issue, which uncertain mixture, or easy and frequent solutions of conjugal society would mightily disturb.

Sect. 81. But tho' these are ties upon mankind, which make the conjugal bonds more firm and lasting in man, than the other species of animals; yet it would give one reason to enquire, why this compact, where procreation and education are secured, and inheritance taken care for, may not be made determinable, either by consent, or at a certain time, or upon certain conditions, as well as any other voluntary compacts, there being no necessity in the nature of the thing, nor to the ends of it, that it should always be for life; I mean, to such as are under no restraint of any positive law, which ordains all such contracts to be perpetual.

Sect. 82. But the husband and wife, though they have but one common concern, yet having different understandings, will unavoidably sometimes have different wills too; it therefore being necessary that the last determination, i. e. the rule, should be placed somewhere; it naturally falls to the man's share, as the abler and the stronger. But this reaching but to the things of their common interest and property, leaves the wife in the full and free possession of what by contract is her peculiar right, and gives the husband no more power over her life than she has over his; the power of the husband being so far from that of an absolute monarch, that the wife has in many cases a liberty to separate from him, where natural right, or their contract allows it; whether that contract be made by themselves in the state of nature, or by the customs or laws of the country they live in; and the children upon such separation fall to the father or mother's lot, as such contract does determine.

Sect. 83. For all the ends of marriage being to be obtained under politic government, as well as in the state of nature, the civil magistrate doth not abridge the right or power of either naturally necessary to those ends, viz. procreation and mutual support and assistance whilst they are together; but only decides any controversy that may arise between man and wife about them. If it were otherwise, and that absolute sovereignty and power of life and death naturally belonged to the husband, and were necessary to the society between man and wife, there could be no matrimony in any of those countries where the husband is allowed no such absolute authority. But the ends of matrimony requiring no such power in the husband, the condition of conjugal society put it not in him, it being not at all necessary to that state. Conjugal society could subsist and attain its ends without it; nay, community of goods, and the power over them, mutual assistance and maintenance, and other things belonging to conjugal society, might be varied and regulated by that contract which unites man and wife in that society, as far as may consist with procreation and the bringing up of children till they could shift for themselves; nothing being necessary to any society, that is not necessary to the ends for which it is made.

Sect. 84. The society betwixt parents and children, and the distinct rights and powers belonging respectively to them, I have treated of so largely, in the foregoing chapter, that I shall not here need to say any thing of it. And I think it is plain, that it is far different from a politic society.

Sect. 85. Master and servant are names as old as history, but given to those of far different condition; for a freeman makes himself a servant to another, by selling him, for a certain time, the service he undertakes to do, in exchange for wages he is to receive: and though this commonly puts him into the family of his master, and under the ordinary discipline thereof; yet it gives the master but a temporary power over him, and no greater than what is contained in the contract between them. But there is another sort of servants, which by a peculiar name we call slaves, who being captives taken in a just war, are by the right of nature subjected to the absolute dominion and arbitrary power of their masters. These men having, as I say, forfeited their lives, and with it their liberties, and lost their estates; and being in the state of slavery, not capable of any property, cannot in that state be considered as any part of civil society; the chief end whereof is the preservation of property.

Sect. 86. Let us therefore consider a master of a family with all these subordinate relations of wife, children, servants, and slaves, united under the domestic rule of a family; which, what resemblance soever it may have in its order, offices, and number too, with a little commonwealth, yet is very far from it, both in its constitution, power and end: or if it must be thought a monarchy, and the paterfamilias the absolute monarch in it, absolute monarchy will have but a very shattered and short power, when it is plain, by what has been said before, that the master of the family has a very distinct and differently limited power, both as to time and extent, over those several persons that are in it; for excepting the slave (and the family is as much a family, and his power as paterfamilias as great, whether there be any slaves in his family or no) he has no legislative power of life and death over any of them, and none too but what a mistress of a family may have as well as he. And he certainly can have no absolute power over the whole family, who has but a very limited one over every individual in it. But how a family, or any other society of men, differ from that which is properly political society, we shall best see, by considering wherein political society itself consists.

Sect. 87. Man being born, as has been proved, with a title to perfect freedom, and an uncontrouled enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of the law of nature, equally with any other man, or number of men in the world, hath by nature a power, not only to preserve his property, that is, his life, liberty and estate, against the injuries and attempts of other men; but to judge of, and punish the breaches of that law in others, as he is persuaded the offence deserves, even with death itself, in crimes where the heinousness of the fact, in his opinion, requires it. But because no political society can be, nor subsist, without having in itself the power to preserve the property, and in order thereunto, punish the offences of all those of that society; there, and there only is political society, where every one of the members hath quitted this natural power, resigned it up into the hands of the community in all cases that exclude him not from appealing for protection to the law established by it. And thus all private judgment of every particular member being excluded, the community comes to be umpire, by settled standing rules, indifferent, and the same to all parties; and by men having authority from the community, for the execution of those rules, decides all the differences that may happen between any members of that society concerning any matter of right; and punishes those offences which any member hath committed against the society, with such penalties as the law has established: whereby it is easy to discern, who are, and who are not, in political society together. Those who are united into one body, and have a common established law and judicature to appeal to, with authority to decide controversies between them, and punish offenders, are in civil society one with another: but those who have no such common appeal, I mean on earth, are still in the state of nature, each being, where there is no other, judge for himself, and executioner; which is, as I have before shewed it, the perfect state of nature.

Sect. 88. And thus the commonwealth comes by a power to set down what punishment shall belong to the several transgressions which they think worthy of it, committed amongst the members of that society, (which is the power of making laws) as well as it has the power to punish any injury done unto any of its members, by any one that is not of it, (which is the power of war and peace;) and all this for the preservation of the property of all the members of that society, as far as is possible. But though every man who has entered into civil society, and is become a member of any commonwealth, has thereby quitted his power to punish offences, against the law of nature, in prosecution of his own private judgment, yet with the judgment of offences, which he has given up to the legislative in all cases, where he can appeal to the magistrate, he has given a right to the commonwealth to employ his force, for the execution of the judgments of the commonwealth, whenever he shall be called to it; which indeed are his own judgments, they being made by himself, or his representative. And herein we have the original of the legislative and executive power of civil society, which is to judge by standing laws, how far offences are to be punished, when committed within the commonwealth; and also to determine, by occasional judgments founded on the present circumstances of the fact, how far injuries from without are to be vindicated; and in both these to employ all the force of all the members, when there shall be need.

Sect. 89. Where-ever therefore any number of men are so united into one society, as to quit every one his executive power of the law of nature, and to resign it to the public, there and there only is a political, or civil society. And this is done, where-ever any number of men, in the state of nature, enter into society to make one people, one body politic, under one supreme government; or else when any one joins himself to, and incorporates with any government already made: for hereby he authorizes the society, or which is all one, the legislative thereof, to make laws for him, as the public good of the society shall require; to the execution whereof, his own assistance (as to his own decrees) is due. And this puts men out of a state of nature into that of a commonwealth, by setting up a judge on earth, with authority to determine all the controversies, and redress the injuries that may happen to any member of the commonwealth; which judge is the legislative, or magistrates appointed by it. And where-ever there are any number of men, however associated, that have no such decisive power to appeal to, there they are still in the state of nature.

Sect. 90. Hence it is evident, that absolute monarchy, which by some men is counted the only government in the world, is indeed inconsistent with civil society, and so can be no form of civil-government at all: for the end of civil society, being to avoid, and remedy those inconveniencies of the state of nature, which necessarily follow from every man's being judge in his own case, by setting up a known authority, to which every one of that society may appeal upon any injury received, or controversy that may arise, and which every one of the society ought to obey;* where-ever any persons are, who have not such an authority to appeal to, for the decision of any difference between them, there those persons are still in the state of nature; and so is every absolute prince, in respect of those who are under his dominion.

(*The public power of all society is above every soul contained in the same society; and the principal use of that power is, to give laws unto all that are under it, which laws in such cases we must obey, unless there be reason shewed which may necessarily inforce, that the law of reason, or of God, doth enjoin the contrary, Hook. Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 16.)

Sect. 91. For he being supposed to have all, both legislative and executive power in himself alone, there is no judge to be found, no appeal lies open to any one, who may fairly, and indifferently, and with authority decide, and from whose decision relief and redress may be expected of any injury or inconviency, that may be suffered from the prince, or by his order: so that such a man, however intitled, Czar, or Grand Seignior, or how you please, is as much in the state of nature, with all under his dominion, as he is with the rest of mankind: for where-ever any two men are, who have no standing rule, and common judge to appeal to on earth, for the determination of controversies of right betwixt them, there they are still in the state of* nature, and under all the inconveniencies of it, with only this woful difference to the subject, or rather slave of an absolute prince: that whereas, in the ordinary state of nature, he has a liberty to judge of his right, and according to the best of his power, to maintain it; now, whenever his property is invaded by the will and order of his monarch, he has not only no appeal, as those in society ought to have, but as if he were degraded from the common state of rational creatures, is denied a liberty to judge of, or to defend his right; and so is exposed to all the misery and inconveniencies, that a man can fear from one, who being in the unrestrained state of nature, is yet corrupted with flattery, and armed with power.

(*To take away all such mutual grievances, injuries and wrongs, i.e. such as attend men in the state of nature, there was no way but only by growing into composition and agreement amongst themselves, by ordaining some kind of govemment public, and by yielding themselves subject thereunto, that unto whom they granted authority to rule and govem, by them the peace, tranquillity and happy estate of the rest might be procured. Men always knew that where force and injury was offered, they might be defenders of themselves; they knew that however men may seek their own commodity, yet if this were done with injury unto others, it was not to be suffered, but by all men, and all good means to be withstood. Finally, they knew that no man might in reason take upon him to determine his own right, and according to his own determination proceed in maintenance thereof, in as much as every man is towards himself, and them whom he greatly affects, partial; and therefore that strifes and troubles would be endless, except they gave their common consent, all to be ordered by some, whom they should agree upon, without which consent there would be no reason that one man should take upon him to be lord or judge over another, Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 10.)

Sect. 92. For he that thinks absolute power purifies men's blood, and corrects the baseness of human nature, need read but the history of this, or any other age, to be convinced of the contrary. He that would have been insolent and injurious in the woods of America, would not probably be much better in a throne; where perhaps learning and religion shall be found out to justify all that he shall do to his subjects, and the sword presently silence all those that dare question it: for what the protection of absolute monarchy is, what kind of fathers of their countries it makes princes to be and to what a degree of happiness and security it carries civil society, where this sort of government is grown to perfection, he that will look into the late relation of Ceylon, may easily see.

Sect. 93. In absolute monarchies indeed, as well as other governments of the world, the subjects have an appeal to the law, and judges to decide any controversies, and restrain any violence that may happen betwixt the subjects themselves, one amongst another. This every one thinks necessary, and believes he deserves to be thought a declared enemy to society and mankind, who should go about to take it away. But whether this be from a true love of mankind and society, and such a charity as we owe all one to another, there is reason to doubt: for this is no more than what every man, who loves his own power, profit, or greatness, may and naturally must do, keep those animals from hurting, or destroying one another, who labour and drudge only for his pleasure and advantage; and so are taken care of, not out of any love the master has for them, but love of himself, and the profit they bring him: for if it be asked, what security, what fence is there, in such a state, against the violence and oppression of this absolute ruler? the very question can scarce be borne. They are ready to tell you, that it deserves death only to ask after safety. Betwixt subject and subject, they will grant, there must be measures, laws and judges, for their mutual peace and security: but as for the ruler, he ought to be absolute, and is above all such circumstances; because he has power to do more hurt and wrong, it is right when he does it. To ask how you may be guarded from harm, or injury, on that side where the strongest hand is to do it, is presently the voice of faction and rebellion: as if when men quitting the state of nature entered into society, they agreed that all of them but one, should be under the restraint of laws, but that he should still retain all the liberty of the state of nature, increased with power, and made licentious by impunity. This is to think, that men are so foolish, that they take care to avoid what mischiefs may be done them by pole-cats, or foxes; but are content, nay, think it safety, to be devoured by lions.

Sect. 94. But whatever flatterers may talk to amuse people's understandings, it hinders not men from feeling; and when they perceive, that any man, in what station soever, is out of the bounds of the civil society which they are of, and that they have no appeal on earth against any harm, they may receive from him, they are apt to think themselves in the state of nature, in respect of him whom they find to be so; and to take care, as soon as they can, to have that safety and security in civil society, for which it was first instituted, and for which only they entered into it. And therefore, though perhaps at first, (as shall be shewed more at large hereafter in the following part of this discourse) some one good and excellent man having got a pre-eminency amongst the rest, had this deference paid to his goodness and virtue, as to a kind of natural authority, that the chief rule, with arbitration of their differences, by a tacit consent devolved into his hands, without any other caution, but the assurance they had of his uprightness and wisdom; yet when time, giving authority, and (as some men would persuade us) sacredness of customs, which the negligent, and unforeseeing innocence of the first ages began, had brought in successors of another stamp, the people finding their properties not secure under the government, as then it was, (whereas government has no other end but the preservation of* property) could never be safe nor at rest, nor think themselves in civil society, till the legislature was placed in collective bodies of men, call them senate, parliament, or what you please. By which means every single person became subject, equally with other the meanest men, to those laws, which he himself, as part of the legislative, had established; nor could any one, by his own authority; avoid the force of the law, when once made; nor by any pretence of superiority plead exemption, thereby to license his own, or the miscarriages of any of his dependents. No man in civil society can be exempted from the laws of it: for if any man may do what he thinks fit, and there be no appeal on earth, for redress or security against any harm he shall do; I ask, whether he be not perfectly still in the state of nature, and so can be no part or member of that civil society; unless any one will say, the state of nature and civil society are one and the same thing, which I have never yet found any one so great a patron of anarchy as to affirm.

(*At the first, when some certain kind of regiment was once appointed, it may be that nothing was then farther thought upon for the manner of goveming, but all permitted unto their wisdom and discretion, which were to rule, till by experience they found this for all parts very inconvenient, so as the thing which they had devised for a remedy, did indeed but increase the sore, which it should have cured. They saw, that to live by one man's will, became the cause of all men's misery. This constrained them to come unto laws, wherein all men might see their duty beforehand, and know the penalties of transgressing them. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 10.)

(Civil law being the act of the whole body politic, doth therefore over-rule each several part of the same body. Hooker, ibid.)

CHAPTER. VIII.

OF THE BEGINNING OF POLITICAL SOCIETIES.

Sect. 95. MEN being, as has been said, by nature, all free, equal, and independent, no one can be put out of this estate, and subjected to the political power of another, without his own consent. The only way whereby any one divests himself of his natural liberty, and puts on the bonds of civil society, is by agreeing with other men to join and unite into a community for their comfortable, safe, and peaceable living one amongst another, in a secure enjoyment of their properties, and a greater security against any, that are not of it. This any number of men may do, because it injures not the freedom of the rest; they are left as they were in the liberty of the state of nature. When any number of men have so consented to make one community or government, they are thereby presently incorporated, and make one body politic, wherein the majority have a right to act and conclude the rest.

Sect. 96. For when any number of men have, by the consent of every individual, made a community, they have thereby made that community one body, with a power to act as one body, which is only by the will and determination of the majority: for that which acts any community, being only the consent of the individuals of it, and it being necessary to that which is one body to move one way; it is necessary the body should move that way whither the greater force carries it, which is the consent of the majority: or else it is impossible it should act or continue one body, one community, which the consent of every individual that united into it, agreed that it should; and so every one is bound by that consent to be concluded by the majority. And therefore we see, that in assemblies, impowered to act by positive laws, where no number is set by that positive law which impowers them, the act of the majority passes for the act of the whole, and of course determines, as having, by the law of nature and reason, the power of the whole.

Sect. 97. And thus every man, by consenting with others to make one body politic under one government, puts himself under an obligation, to every one of that society, to submit to the determination of the majority, and to be concluded by it; or else this original compact, whereby he with others incorporates into one society, would signify nothing, and be no compact, if he be left free, and under no other ties than he was in before in the state of nature. For what appearance would there be of any compact? what new engagement if he were no farther tied by any decrees of the society, than he himself thought fit, and did actually consent to? This would be still as great a liberty, as he himself had before his compact, or any one else in the state of nature hath, who may submit himself, and consent to any acts of it if he thinks fit.

Sect. 98. For if the consent of the majority shall not, in reason, be received as the act of the whole, and conclude every individual; nothing but the consent of every individual can make any thing to be the act of the whole: but such a consent is next to impossible ever to be had, if we consider the infirmities of health, and avocations of business, which in a number, though much less than that of a commonwealth, will necessarily keep many away from the public assembly. To which if we add the variety of opinions, and contrariety of interests, which unavoidably happen in all collections of men, the coming into society upon such terms would be only like Cato's coming into the theatre, only to go out again. Such a constitution as this would make the mighty Leviathan of a shorter duration, than the feeblest creatures, and not let it outlast the day it was born in: which cannot be supposed, till we can think, that rational creatures should desire and constitute societies only to be dissolved: for where the majority cannot conclude the rest, there they cannot act as one body, and consequently will be immediately dissolved again.

Sect. 99. Whosoever therefore out of a state of nature unite into a community, must be understood to give up all the power, necessary to the ends for which they unite into society, to the majority of the community, unless they expresly agreed in any number greater than the majority. And this is done by barely agreeing to unite into one political society, which is all the compact that is, or needs be, between the individuals, that enter into, or make up a commonwealth. And thus that, which begins and actually constitutes any political society, is nothing but the consent of any number of freemen capable of a majority to unite and incorporate into such a society. And this is that, and that only, which did, or could give beginning to any lawful government in the world.

Sect. 100. To this I find two objections made. First, That there are no instances to be found in story, of a company of men independent, and equal one amongst another, that met together, and in this way began and set up a government.

Secondly, It is impossible of right, that men should do so, because all men being born under government, they are to submit to that, and are not at liberty to begin a new one.

Sect. 101. To the first there is this to answer, That it is not at all to be wondered, that history gives us but a very little account of men, that lived together in the state of nature. The inconveniences of that condition, and the love and want of society, no sooner brought any number of them together, but they presently united and incorporated, if they designed to continue together. And if we may not suppose men ever to have been in the state of nature, because we hear not much of them in such a state, we may as well suppose the armies of Salmanasser or Xerxes were never children, because we hear little of them, till they were men, and imbodied in armies. Government is every where antecedent to records, and letters seldom come in amongst a people till a long continuation of civil society has, by other more necessary arts, provided for their safety, ease, and plenty: and then they begin to look after the history of their founders, and search into their original, when they have outlived the memory of it: for it is with commonwealths as with particular persons, they are commonly ignorant of their own births and infancies: and if they know any thing of their original, they are beholden for it, to the accidental records that others have kept of it. And those that we have, of the beginning of any polities in the world, excepting that of the Jews, where God himself immediately interposed, and which favours not at all paternal dominion, are all either plain instances of such a beginning as I have mentioned, or at least have manifest footsteps of it.

Sect. 102. He must shew a strange inclination to deny evident matter of fact, when it agrees not with his hypothesis, who will not allow, that the beginning of Rome and Venice were by the uniting together of several men free and independent one of another, amongst whom there was no natural superiority or subjection. And if Josephus Acosta's word may be taken, he tells us, that in many parts of America there was no government at all.

There are great and apparent conjectures, says he, that these men, speaking of those of Peru, for a long time had neither kings nor commonwealths, but lived in troops, as they do this day in Florida, the Cheriquanas, those of Brazil, and many other nations, which have no certain kings, but as occasion is offered, in peace or war, they choose their captains as they please, 1. i. c. 25.

If it be said, that every man there was born subject to his father, or the head of his family; that the subjection due from a child to a father took not away his freedom of uniting into what political society he thought fit, has been already proved. But be that as it will, these men, it is evident, were actually free; and whatever superiority some politicians now would place in any of them, they themselves claimed it not, but by consent were all equal, till by the same consent they set rulers over themselves. So that their politic societies all began from a voluntary union, and the mutual agreement of men freely acting in the choice of their governors, and forms of government.

Sect. 103. And I hope those who went away from Sparta with Palantus, mentioned by Justin, 1. iii. c. 4. will be allowed to have been freemen independent one of another, and to have set up a government over themselves, by their own consent. Thus I have given several examples, out of history, of people free and in the state of nature, that being met together incorporated and began a commonwealth. And if the want of such instances be an argument to prove that government were not, nor could not be so begun, I suppose the contenders for paternal empire were better let it alone, than urge it against natural liberty: for if they can give so many instances, out of history, of governments begun upon paternal right, I think (though at best an argument from what has been, to what should of right be, has no great force) one might, without any great danger, yield them the cause. But if I might advise them in the case, they would do well not to search too much into the original of governments, as they have begun de facto, lest they should find, at the foundation of most of them, something very little favourable to the design they promote, and such a power as they contend for.

Sect. 104. But to conclude, reason being plain on our side, that men are naturally free, and the examples of history shewing, that the governments of the world, that were begun in peace, had their beginning laid on that foundation, and were made by the consent of the people; there can be little room for doubt, either where the right is, or what has been the opinion, or practice of mankind, about the first erecting of governments.

Sect. 105. I will not deny, that if we look back as far as history will direct us, towards the original of commonwealths, we shall generally find them under the government and administration of one man. And I am also apt to believe, that where a family was numerous enough to subsist by itself, and continued entire together, without mixing with others, as it often happens, where there is much land, and few people, the government commonly began in the father: for the father having, by the law of nature, the same power with every man else to punish, as he thought fit, any offences against that law, might thereby punish his transgressing children, even when they were men, and out of their pupilage; and they were very likely to submit to his punishment, and all join with him against the offender, in their turns, giving him thereby power to execute his sentence against any transgression, and so in effect make him the law-maker, and governor over all that remained in conjunction with his family. He was fittest to be trusted; paternal affection secured their property and interest under his care; and the custom of obeying him, in their childhood, made it easier to submit to him, rather than to any other. If therefore they must have one to rule them, as government is hardly to be avoided amongst men that live together; who so likely to be the man as he that was their common father; unless negligence, cruelty, or any other defect of mind or body made him unfit for it? But when either the father died, and left his next heir, for want of age, wisdom, courage, or any other qualities, less fit for rule; or where several families met, and consented to continue together; there, it is not to be doubted, but they used their natural freedom, to set up him, whom they judged the ablest, and most likely, to rule well over them. Conformable hereunto we find the people of America, who (living out of the reach of the conquering swords, and spreading domination of the two great empires of Peru and Mexico) enjoyed their own natural freedom, though, caeteris paribus, they commonly prefer the heir of their deceased king; yet if they find him any way weak, or uncapable, they pass him by, and set up the stoutest and bravest man for their ruler.

Sect. 106. Thus, though looking back as far as records give us any account of peopling the world, and the history of nations, we commonly find the government to be in one hand; yet it destroys not that which I affirm, viz. that the beginning of politic society depends upon the consent of the individuals, to join into, and make one society; who, when they are thus incorporated, might set up what form of government they thought fit. But this having given occasion to men to mistake, and think, that by nature government was monarchical, and belonged to the father, it may not be amiss here to consider, why people in the beginning generally pitched upon this form, which though perhaps the father's pre-eminency might, in the first institution of some commonwealths, give a rise to, and place in the beginning, the power in one hand; yet it is plain that the reason, that continued the form of government in a single person, was not any regard, or respect to paternal authority; since all petty monarchies, that is, almost all monarchies, near their original, have been commonly, at least upon occasion, elective.

Sect. 107. First then, in the beginning of things, the father's government of the childhood of those sprung from him, having accustomed them to the rule of one man, and taught them that where it was exercised with care and skill, with affection and love to those under it, it was sufficient to procure and preserve to men all the political happiness they sought for in society. It was no wonder that they should pitch upon, and naturally run into that form of government, which from their infancy they had been all accustomed to; and which, by experience, they had found both easy and safe. To which, if we add, that monarchy being simple, and most obvious to men, whom neither experience had instructed in forms of government, nor the ambition or insolence of empire had taught to beware of the encroachments of prerogative, or the inconveniences of absolute power, which monarchy in succession was apt to lay claim to, and bring upon them, it was not at all strange, that they should not much trouble themselves to think of methods of restraining any exorbitances of those to whom they had given the authority over them, and of balancing the power of government, by placing several parts of it in different hands. They had neither felt the oppression of tyrannical dominion, nor did the fashion of the age, nor their possessions, or way of living, (which afforded little matter for covetousness or ambition) give them any reason to apprehend or provide against it; and therefore it is no wonder they put themselves into such a frame of government, as was not only, as I said, most obvious and simple, but also best suited to their present state and condition; which stood more in need of defence against foreign invasions and injuries, than of multiplicity of laws. The equality of a simple poor way of living, confining their desires within the narrow bounds of each man's small property, made few controversies, and so no need of many laws to decide them, or variety of officers to superintend the process, or look after the execution of justice, where there were but few trespasses, and few offenders. Since then those, who like one another so well as to join into society, cannot but be supposed to have some acquaintance and friendship together, and some trust one in another; they could not but have greater apprehensions of others, than of one another: and therefore their first care and thought cannot but be supposed to be, how to secure themselves against foreign force. It was natural for them to put themselves under a frame of government which might best serve to that end, and chuse the wisest and bravest man to conduct them in their wars, and lead them out against their enemies, and in this chiefly be their ruler.

Sect. 108. Thus we see, that the kings of the Indians in America, which is still a pattern of the first ages in Asia and Europe, whilst the inhabitants were too few for the country, and want of people and money gave men no temptation to enlarge their possessions of land, or contest for wider extent of ground, are little more than generals of their armies; and though they command absolutely in war, yet at home and in time of peace they exercise very little dominion, and have but a very moderate sovereignty, the resolutions of peace and war being ordinarily either in the people, or in a council. Tho' the war itself, which admits not of plurality of governors, naturally devolves the command into the king's sole authority.

Sect. 109. And thus in Israel itself, the chief business of their judges, and first kings, seems to have been to be captains in war, and leaders of their armies; which (besides what is signified by going out and in before the people, which was, to march forth to war, and home again in the heads of their forces) appears plainly in the story of Jephtha. The Ammonites making war upon Israel, the Gileadites in fear send to Jephtha, a bastard of their family whom they had cast off, and article with him, if he will assist them against the Ammonites, to make him their ruler; which they do in these words, And the people made him head and captain over them, Judg. xi, 11. which was, as it seems, all one as to be judge. And he judged Israel, judg. xii. 7. that is, was their captain-general six years. So when Jotham upbraids the Shechemites with the obligation they had to Gideon, who had been their judge and ruler, he tells them, He fought for you, and adventured his life far, and delivered you out of the hands of Midian, Judg. ix. 17. Nothing mentioned of him but what he did as a general: and indeed that is all is found in his history, or in any of the rest of the judges. And Abimelech particularly is called king, though at most he was but their general. And when, being weary of the ill conduct of Samuel's sons, the children of Israel desired a king, like all the nations to judge them, and to go out before them, and to fight their battles, I. Sam viii. 20. God granting their desire, says to Samuel, I will send thee a man, and thou shalt anoint him to be captain over my people Israel, that he may save my people out of the hands of the Philistines, ix. 16. As if the only business of a king had been to lead out their armies, and fight in their defence; and accordingly at his inauguration pouring a vial of oil upon him, declares to Saul, that the Lord had anointed him to be captain over his inheritance, x. 1. And therefore those, who after Saul's being solemnly chosen and saluted king by the tribes at Mispah, were unwilling to have him their king, made no other objection but this, How shall this man save us? v. 27. as if they should have said, this man is unfit to be our king, not having skill and conduct enough in war, to be able to defend us. And when God resolved to transfer the government to David, it is in these words, But now thy kingdom shall not continue: the Lord hath sought him a man after his own heart, and the Lord hath commanded him to be captain over his people, xiii. 14. As if the whole kingly authority were nothing else but to be their general: and therefore the tribes who had stuck to Saul's family, and opposed David's reign, when they came to Hebron with terms of submission to him, they tell him, amongst other arguments they had to submit to him as to their king, that he was in effect their king in Saul's time, and therefore they had no reason but to receive him as their king now. Also (say they) in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that reddest out and broughtest in Israel, and the Lord said unto thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be a captain over Israel.

Sect. 110. Thus, whether a family by degrees grew up into a commonwealth, and the fatherly authority being continued on to the elder son, every one in his turn growing up under it, tacitly submitted to it, and the easiness and equality of it not offending any one, every one acquiesced, till time seemed to have confirmed it, and settled a right of succession by prescription: or whether several families, or the descendants of several families, whom chance, neighbourhood, or business brought together, uniting into society, the need of a general, whose conduct might defend them against their enemies in war, and the great confidence the innocence and sincerity of that poor but virtuous age, (such as are almost all those which begin governments, that ever come to last in the world) gave men one of another, made the first beginners of commonwealths generally put the rule into one man's hand, without any other express limitation or restraint, but what the nature of the thing, and the end of government required: which ever of those it was that at first put the rule into the hands of a single person, certain it is no body was intrusted with it but for the public good and safety, and to those ends, in the infancies of commonwealths, those who had it commonly used it. And unless they had done so, young societies could not have subsisted; without such nursing fathers tender and careful of the public weal, all governments would have sunk under the weakness and infirmities of their infancy, and the prince and the people had soon perished together.

Sect. 111. But though the golden age (before vain ambition, and amor sceleratus habendi, evil concupiscence, had corrupted men's minds into a mistake of true power and honour) had more virtue, and consequently better governors, as well as less vicious subjects, and there was then no stretching prerogative on the one side, to oppress the people; nor consequently on the other, any dispute about privilege, to lessen or restrain the power of the magistrate, and so no contest betwixt rulers and people about governors or government: yet, when ambition and luxury in future ages* would retain and increase the power, without doing the business for which it was given; and aided by flattery, taught princes to have distinct and separate interests from their people, men found it necessary to examine more carefully the original and rights of government; and to find out ways to restrain the exorbitances, and prevent the abuses of that power, which they having intrusted in another's hands only for their own good, they found was made use of to hurt them.

(*At first, when some certain kind of regiment was once approved, it may be nothing was then farther thought upon for the manner of governing, but all permitted unto their wisdom and discretion which were to rule, till by experience they found this for all parts very inconvenient, so as the thing which they had devised for a remedy, did indeed but increase the sore which it should have cured. They saw, that to live by one man's will, became the cause of all men's misery. This constrained them to come unto laws wherein all men might see their duty before hand, and know the penalties of transgressing them. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 10.)

Sect. 112. Thus we may see how probable it is, that people that were naturally free, and by their own consent either submitted to the government of their father, or united together out of different families to make a government, should generally put the rule into one man's hands, and chuse to be under the conduct of a single person, without so much as by express conditions limiting or regulating his power, which they thought safe enough in his honesty and prudence; though they never dreamed of monarchy being lure Divino, which we never heard of among mankind, till it was revealed to us by the divinity of this last age; nor ever allowed paternal power to have a right to dominion, or to be the foundation of all government. And thus much may suffice to shew, that as far as we have any light from history, we have reason to conclude, that all peaceful beginnings of government have been laid in the consent of the people. I say peaceful, because I shall have occasion in another place to speak of conquest, which some esteem a way of beginning of governments.

The other objection I find urged against the beginning of polities, in the way I have mentioned, is this, viz.

Sect. 113. That all men being born under government, some or other, it is impossible any of them should ever be free, and at liberty to unite together, and begin a new one, or ever be able to erect a lawful government.

If this argument be good; I ask, how came so many lawful monarchies into the world? for if any body, upon this supposition, can shew me any one man in any age of the world free to begin a lawful monarchy, I will be bound to shew him ten other free men at liberty, at the same time to unite and begin a new government under a regal, or any other form; it being demonstration, that if any one, born under the dominion of another, may be so free as to have a right to command others in a new and distinct empire, every one that is born under the dominion of another may be so free too, and may become a ruler, or subject, of a distinct separate government. And so by this their own principle, either all men, however born, are free, or else there is but one lawful prince, one lawful government in the world. And then they have nothing to do, but barely to shew us which that is; which when they have done, I doubt not but all mankind will easily agree to pay obedience to him.

Sect. 114. Though it be a sufficient answer to their objection, to shew that it involves them in the same difficulties that it doth those they use it against; yet I shall endeavour to discover the weakness of this argument a little farther. All men, say they, are born under government, and therefore they cannot be at liberty to begin a new one. Every one is born a subject to his father, or his prince, and is therefore under the perpetual tie of subjection and allegiance. It is plain mankind never owned nor considered any such natural subjection that they were born in, to one or to the other that tied them, without their own consents, to a subjection to them and their heirs.

Sect. 115. For there are no examples so frequent in history, both sacred and profane, as those of men withdrawing themselves, and their obedience, from the jurisdiction they were born under, and the family or community they were bred up in, and setting up new governments in other places; from whence sprang all that number of petty commonwealths in the beginning of ages, and which always multiplied, as long as there was room enough, till the stronger, or more fortunate, swallowed the weaker; and those great ones again breaking to pieces, dissolved into lesser dominions. All which are so many testimonies against paternal sovereignty, and plainly prove, that it was not the natural right of the father descending to his heirs, that made governments in the beginning, since it was impossible, upon that ground, there should have been so many little kingdoms; all must have been but only one universal monarchy, if men had not been at liberty to separate themselves from their families, and the government, be it what it will, that was set up in it, and go and make distinct commonwealths and other governments, as they thought fit.

Sect. 116. This has been the practice of the world from its first beginning to this day; nor is it now any more hindrance to the freedom of mankind, that they are born under constituted and ancient polities, that have established laws, and set forms of government, than if they were born in the woods, amongst the unconfined inhabitants, that run loose in them: for those, who would persuade us, that by being born under any government, we are naturally subjects to it, and have no more any title or pretence to the freedom of the state of nature, have no other reason (bating that of paternal power, which we have already answered) to produce for it, but only, because our fathers or progenitors passed away their natural liberty, and thereby bound up themselves and their posterity to a perpetual subjection to the government, which they themselves submitted to. It is true, that whatever engagements or promises any one has made for himself, he is under the obligation of them, but cannot, by any compact whatsoever, bind his children or posterity: for his son, when a man, being altogether as free as the father, any act of the father can no more give away the liberty of the son, than it can of any body else: he may indeed annex such conditions to the land, he enjoyed as a subject of any commonwealth, as may oblige his son to be of that community, if he will enjoy those possessions which were his father's; because that estate being his father's property, he may dispose, or settle it, as he pleases.

Sect. 117. And this has generally given the occasion to mistake in this matter; because commonwealths not permitting any part of their dominions to be dismembered, nor to be enjoyed by any but those of their community, the son cannot ordinarily enjoy the possessions of his father, but under the same terms his father did, by becoming a member of the society; whereby he puts himself presently under the government he finds there established, as much as any other subject of that commonwealth. And thus the consent of freemen, born under government, which only makes them members of it, being given separately in their turns, as each comes to be of age, and not in a multitude together; people take no notice of it, and thinking it not done at all, or not necessary, conclude they are naturally subjects as they are men.

Sect. 118. But, it is plain, governments themselves understand it otherwise; they claim no power over the son, because of that they had over the father; nor look on children as being their subjects, by their fathers being so. If a subject of England have a child, by an English woman in France, whose subject is he? Not the king of England's; for he must have leave to be admitted to the privileges of it: nor the king of France's; for how then has his father a liberty to bring him away, and breed him as he pleases? and who ever was judged as a traytor or deserter, if he left, or warred against a country, for being barely born in it of parents that were aliens there? It is plain then, by the practice of governments themselves, as well as by the law of right reason, that a child is born a subject of no country or government. He is under his father's tuition and authority, till he comes to age of discretion; and then he is a freeman, at liberty what government he will put himself under, what body politic he will unite himself to: for if an Englishman's son, born in France, be at liberty, and may do so, it is evident there is no tie upon him by his father's being a subject of this kingdom; nor is he bound up by any compact of his ancestors. And why then hath not his son, by the same reason, the same liberty, though he be born any where else? Since the power that a father hath naturally over his children, is the same, where-ever they be born, and the ties of natural obligations, are not bounded by the positive limits of kingdoms and commonwealths.

Sect. 119. Every man being, as has been shewed, naturally free, and nothing being able to put him into subjection to any earthly power, but only his own consent; it is to be considered, what shall be understood to be a sufficient declaration of a man's consent, to make him subject to the laws of any government. There is a common distinction of an express and a tacit consent, which will concern our present case. No body doubts but an express consent, of any man entering into any society, makes him a perfect member of that society, a subject of that government. The difficulty is, what ought to be looked upon as a tacit consent, and how far it binds, i.e. how far any one shall be looked on to have consented, and thereby submitted to any government, where he has made no expressions of it at all. And to this I say, that every man, that hath any possessions, or enjoyment, of any part of the dominions of any government, doth thereby give his tacit consent, and is as far forth obliged to obedience to the laws of that government, during such enjoyment, as any one under it; whether this his possession be of land, to him and his heirs for ever, or a lodging only for a week; or whether it be barely travelling freely on the highway; and in effect, it reaches as far as the very being of any one within the territories of that government.

Sect. 120. To understand this the better, it is fit to consider, that every man, when he at first incorporates himself into any commonwealth, he, by his uniting himself thereunto, annexed also, and submits to the community, those possessions, which he has, or shall acquire, that do not already belong to any other government: for it would be a direct contradiction, for any one to enter into society with others for the securing and regulating of property; and yet to suppose his land, whose property is to be regulated by the laws of the society, should be exempt from the jurisdiction of that government, to which he himself, the proprietor of the land, is a subject. By the same act therefore, whereby any one unites his person, which was before free, to any commonwealth, by the same he unites his possessions, which were before free, to it also; and they become, both of them, person and possession, subject to the government and dominion of that commonwealth, as long as it hath a being. Whoever therefore, from thenceforth, by inheritance, purchase, permission, or otherways, enjoys any part of the land, so annexed to, and under the government of that commonwealth, must take it with the condition it is under; that is, of submitting to the government of the commonwealth, under whose jurisdiction it is, as far forth as any subject of it.

Sect. 121. But since the government has a direct jurisdiction only over the land, and reaches the possessor of it, (before he has actually incorporated himself in the society) only as he dwells upon, and enjoys that; the obligation any one is under, by virtue of such enjoyment, to submit to the government, begins and ends with the enjoyment; so that whenever the owner, who has given nothing but such a tacit consent to the government, will, by donation, sale, or otherwise, quit the said possession, he is at liberty to go and incorporate himself into any other commonwealth; or to agree with others to begin a new one, in vacuis locis, in any part of the world, they can find free and unpossessed: whereas he, that has once, by actual agreement, and any express declaration, given his consent to be of any commonwealth, is perpetually and indispensably obliged to be, and remain unalterably a subject to it, and can never be again in the liberty of the state of nature; unless, by any calamity, the government he was under comes to be dissolved; or else by some public act cuts him off from being any longer a member of it.

Sect. 122. But submitting to the laws of any country, living quietly, and enjoying privileges and protection under them, makes not a man a member of that society: this is only a local protection and homage due to and from all those, who, not being in a state of war, come within the territories belonging to any government, to all parts whereof the force of its laws extends. But this no more makes a man a member of that society, a perpetual subject of that commonwealth, than it would make a man a subject to another, in whose family he found it convenient to abide for some time; though, whilst he continued in it, he were obliged to comply with the laws, and submit to the government he found there. And thus we see, that foreigners, by living all their lives under another government, and enjoying the privileges and protection of it, though they are bound, even in conscience, to submit to its administration, as far forth as any denison; yet do not thereby come to be subjects or members of that commonwealth. Nothing can make any man so, but his actually entering into it by positive engagement, and express promise and compact. This is that, which I think, concerning the beginning of political societies, and that consent which makes any one a member of any commonwealth.

CHAPTER. IX.

OF THE ENDS OF POLITICAL SOCIETY AND GOVERNMENT.

Sect. 123. IF man in the state of nature be so free, as has been said; if he be absolute lord of his own person and possessions, equal to the greatest, and subject to no body, why will he part with his freedom? why will he give up this empire, and subject himself to the dominion and controul of any other power? To which it is obvious to answer, that though in the state of nature he hath such a right, yet the enjoyment of it is very uncertain, and constantly exposed to the invasion of others: for all being kings as much as he, every man his equal, and the greater part no strict observers of equity and justice, the enjoyment of the property he has in this state is very unsafe, very unsecure. This makes him willing to quit a condition, which, however free, is full of fears and continual dangers: and it is not without reason, that he seeks out, and is willing to join in society with others, who are already united, or have a mind to unite, for the mutual preservation of their lives, liberties and estates, which I call by the general name, property.

Sect. 124. The great and chief end, therefore, of men's uniting into commonwealths, and putting themselves under government, is the preservation of their property. To which in the state of nature there are many things wanting.

First, There wants an established, settled, known law, received and allowed by common consent to be the standard of right and wrong, and the common measure to decide all controversies between them: for though the law of nature be plain and intelligible to all rational creatures; yet men being biassed by their interest, as well as ignorant for want of study of it, are not apt to allow of it as a law binding to them in the application of it to their particular cases.

Sect. 125. Secondly, In the state of nature there wants a known and indifferent judge, with authority to determine all differences according to the established law: for every one in that state being both judge and executioner of the law of nature, men being partial to themselves, passion and revenge is very apt to carry them too far, and with too much heat, in their own cases; as well as negligence, and unconcernedness, to make them too remiss in other men's.

Sect. 126. Thirdly, In the state of nature there often wants power to back and support the sentence when right, and to give it due execution, They who by any injustice offended, will seldom fail, where they are able, by force to make good their injustice; such resistance many times makes the punishment dangerous, and frequently destructive, to those who attempt it.

Sect. 127. Thus mankind, notwithstanding all the privileges of the state of nature, being but in an ill condition, while they remain in it, are quickly driven into society. Hence it comes to pass, that we seldom find any number of men live any time together in this state. The inconveniencies that they are therein exposed to, by the irregular and uncertain exercise of the power every man has of punishing the transgressions of others, make them take sanctuary under the established laws of government, and therein seek the preservation of their property. It is this makes them so willingly give up every one his single power of punishing, to be exercised by such alone, as shall be appointed to it amongst them; and by such rules as the community, or those authorized by them to that purpose, shall agree on. And in this we have the original right and rise of both the legislative and executive power, as well as of the governments and societies themselves.

Sect. 128. For in the state of nature, to omit the liberty he has of innocent delights, a man has two powers.

The first is to do whatsoever he thinks fit for the preservation of himself, and others within the permission of the law of nature: by which law, common to them all, he and all the rest of mankind are one community, make up one society, distinct from all other creatures.

And were it not for the corruption and vitiousness of degenerate men, there would be no need of any other; no necessity that men should separate from this great and natural community, and by positive agreements combine into smaller and divided associations.

The other power a man has in the state of nature, is the power to punish the crimes committed against that law. Both these he gives up, when he joins in a private, if I may so call it, or particular politic society, and incorporates into any commonwealth, separate from the rest of mankind.

Sect. 129. The first power, viz. of doing whatsoever he thought for the preservation of himself, and the rest of mankind, he gives up to be regulated by laws made by the society, so far forth as the preservation of himself, and the rest of that society shall require; which laws of the society in many things confine the liberty he had by the law of nature.

Sect. 130. Secondly, The power of punishing he wholly gives up, and engages his natural force, (which he might before employ in the execution of the law of nature, by his own single authority, as he thought fit) to assist the executive power of the society, as the law thereof shall require: for being now in a new state, wherein he is to enjoy many conveniencies, from the labour, assistance, and society of others in the same community, as well as protection from its whole strength; he is to part also with as much of his natural liberty, in providing for himself, as the good, prosperity, and safety of the society shall require; which is not only necessary, but just, since the other members of the society do the like.

Sect. 131. But though men, when they enter into society, give up the equality, liberty, and executive power they had in the state of nature, into the hands of the society, to be so far disposed of by the legislative, as the good of the society shall require; yet it being only with an intention in every one the better to preserve himself, his liberty and property; (for no rational creature can be supposed to change his condition with an intention to be worse) the power of the society, or legislative constituted by them, can never be supposed to extend farther, than the common good; but is obliged to secure every one's property, by providing against those three defects above mentioned, that made the state of nature so unsafe and uneasy. And so whoever has the legislative or supreme power of any commonwealth, is bound to govern by established standing laws, promulgated and known to the people, and not by extemporary decrees; by indifferent and upright judges, who are to decide controversies by those laws; and to employ the force of the community at home, only in the execution of such laws, or abroad to prevent or redress foreign injuries, and secure the community from inroads and invasion. And all this to be directed to no other end, but the peace, safety, and public good of the people.

CHAPTER. X.

OF THE FORMS OF A COMMON-WEALTH.

Sect. 132. THE majority having, as has been shewed, upon men's first uniting into society, the whole power of the community naturally in them, may employ all that power in making laws for the community from time to time, and executing those laws by officers of their own appointing; and then the form of the government is a perfect democracy: or else may put the power of making laws into the hands of a few select men, and their heirs or successors; and then it is an oligarchy: or else into the hands of one man, and then it is a monarchy: if to him and his heirs, it is an hereditary monarchy: if to him only for life, but upon his death the power only of nominating a successor to return to them; an elective monarchy. And so accordingly of these the community may make compounded and mixed forms of government, as they think good. And if the legislative power be at first given by the majority to one or more persons only for their lives, or any limited time, and then the supreme power to revert to them again; when it is so reverted, the community may dispose of it again anew into what hands they please, and so constitute a new form of government: for the form of government depending upon the placing the supreme power, which is the legislative, it being impossible to conceive that an inferior power should prescribe to a superior, or any but the supreme make laws, according as the power of making laws is placed, such is the form of the commonwealth.

Sect. 133. By commonwealth, I must be understood all along to mean, not a democracy, or any form of government, but any independent community, which the Latines signified by the word civitas, to which the word which best answers in our language, is commonwealth, and most properly expresses such a society of men, which community or city in English does not; for there may be subordinate communities in a government; and city amongst us has a quite different notion from commonwealth: and therefore, to avoid ambiguity, I crave leave to use the word commonwealth in that sense, in which I find it used by king James the first; and I take it to be its genuine signification; which if any body dislike, I consent with him to change it for a better.

CHAPTER. XI.

OF THE EXTENT OF THE LEGISLATIVE POWER.

Sect. 134. THE great end of men's entering into society, being the enjoyment of their properties in peace and safety, and the great instrument and means of that being the laws established in that society; the first and fundamental positive law of all commonwealths is the establishing of the legislative power; as the first and fundamental natural law, which is to govern even the legislative itself, is the preservation of the society, and (as far as will consist with the public good) of every person in it. This legislative is not only the supreme power of the commonwealth, but sacred and unalterable in the hands where the community have once placed it; nor can any edict of any body else, in what form soever conceived, or by what power soever backed, have the force and obligation of a law, which has not its sanction from that legislative which the public has chosen and appointed: for without this the law could not have that, which is absolutely necessary to its being a law,* the consent of the society, over whom no body can have a power to make laws, but by their own consent, and by authority received from them; and therefore all the obedience, which by the most solemn ties any one can be obliged to pay, ultimately terminates in this supreme power, and is directed by those laws which it enacts: nor can any oaths to any foreign power whatsoever, or any domestic subordinate power, discharge any member of the society from his obedience to the legislative, acting pursuant to their trust; nor oblige him to any obedience contrary to the laws so enacted, or farther than they do allow; it being ridiculous to imagine one can be tied ultimately to obey any power in the society, which is not the supreme.

(*The lawful power of making laws to command whole politic societies of men, belonging so properly unto the same intire societies, that for any prince or potentate of what kind soever upon earth, to exercise the same of himself, and not by express commission immediately and personally received from God, or else by authority derived at the first from their consent, upon whose persons they impose laws, it is no better than mere tyranny. Laws they are not therefore which public approbation hath not made so. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 10.

Of this point therefore we are to note, that such men naturally have no full and perfect power to command whole politic multitudes of men, therefore utterly without our consent, we could in such sort be at no man's commandment living. And to be commanded we do consent, when that society, whereof we be a part, hath at any time before consented, without revoking the same after by the like universal agreement. Laws therefore human, of what kind so ever, are available by consent. Ibid.)

Sect. 135. Though the legislative, whether placed in one or more, whether it be always in being, or only by intervals, though it be the supreme power in every commonwealth; yet:

First, It is not, nor can possibly be absolutely arbitrary over the lives and fortunes of the people: for it being but the joint power of every member of the society given up to that person, or assembly, which is legislator; it can be no more than those persons had in a state of nature before they entered into society, and gave up to the community: for no body can transfer to another more power than he has in himself; and no body has an absolute arbitrary power over himself, or over any other, to destroy his own life, or take away the life or property of another. A man, as has been proved, cannot subject himself to the arbitrary power of another; and having in the state of nature no arbitrary power over the life, liberty, or possession of another, but only so much as the law of nature gave him for the preservation of himself, and the rest of mankind; this is all he doth, or can give up to the commonwealth, and by it to the legislative power, so that the legislative can have no more than this. Their power, in the utmost bounds of it, is limited to the public good of the society. It is a power, that hath no other end but preservation, and therefore can never have a right to destroy, enslave, or designedly to impoverish the subjects.* The obligations of the law of nature cease not in society, but only in many cases are drawn closer, and have by human laws known penalties annexed to them, to inforce their observation. Thus the law of nature stands as an eternal rule to all men, legislators as well as others. The rules that they make for other men's actions, must, as well as their own and other men's actions, be conformable to the law of nature, i.e. to the will of God, of which that is a declaration, and the fundamental law of nature being the preservation of mankind, no human sanction can be good, or valid against it.

(*Two foundations there are which bear up public societies; the one a natural inclination, whereby all men desire sociable life and fellowship; the other an order, expresly or secretly agreed upon, touching the manner of their union in living together: the latter is that which we call the law of a common-weal, the very soul of a politic body, the parts whereof are by law animated, held together, and set on work in such actions as the common good requireth. Laws politic, ordained for external order and regiment amongst men, are never framed as they should be, unless presuming the will of man to be inwardly obstinate, rebellious, and averse from all obedience to the sacred laws of his nature; in a word, unless presuming man to be, in regard of his depraved mind, little better than a wild beast, they do accordingly provide, notwithstanding, so to frame his outward actions, that they be no hindrance unto the common good, for which societies are instituted. Unless they do this, they are not perfect. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. i. sect. 10.)

Sect. 136. Secondly, The legislative, or supreme authority, cannot assume to its self a power to rule by extemporary arbitrary decrees, but is bound to dispense justice, and decide the rights of the subject by promulgated standing laws, and known authorized judges:* for the law of nature being unwritten, and so no where to be found but in the minds of men, they who through passion or interest shall miscite, or misapply it, cannot so easily be convinced of their mistake where there is no established judge: and so it serves not, as it ought, to determine the rights, and fence the properties of those that live under it, especially where every one is judge, interpreter, and executioner of it too, and that in his own case: and he that has right on his side, having ordinarily but his own single strength, hath not force enough to defend himself from injuries, or to punish delinquents. To avoid these inconveniences, which disorder men's propperties in the state of nature, men unite into societies, that they may have the united strength of the whole society to secure and defend their properties, and may have standing rules to bound it, by which every one may know what is his. To this end it is that men give up all their natural power to the society which they enter into, and the community put the legislative power into such hands as they think fit, with this trust, that they shall be governed by declared laws, or else their peace, quiet, and property will still be at the same uncertainty, as it was in the state of nature.

(*Human laws are measures in respect of men whose actions they must direct, howbeit such measures they are as have also their higher rules to be measured by, which rules are two, the law of God, and the law of nature; so that laws human must be made according to the general laws of nature, and without contradiction to any positive law of scripture, otherwise they are ill made. Hooker's Eccl. Pol. l. iii. sect. 9.

Sect. 137. Absolute arbitrary power, or governing without settled standing laws, can neither of them consist with the ends of society and government, which men would not quit the freedom of the state of nature for, and tie themselves up under, were it not to preserve their lives, liberties and fortunes, and by stated rules of right and property to secure their peace and quiet. It cannot be supposed that they should intend, had they a power so to do, to give to any one, or more, an absolute arbitrary power over their persons and estates, and put a force into the magistrate's hand to execute his unlimited will arbitrarily upon them. This were to put themselves into a worse condition than the state of nature, wherein they had a liberty to defend their right against the injuries of others, and were upon equal terms of force to maintain it, whether invaded by a single man, or many in combination. Whereas by supposing they have given up themselves to the absolute arbitrary power and will of a legislator, they have disarmed themselves, and armed him, to make a prey of them when he pleases; he being in a much worse condition, who is exposed to the arbitrary power of one man, who has the command of 100,000, than he that is exposed to the arbitrary power of 100,000 single men; no body being secure, that his will, who has such a command, is better than that of other men, though his force be 100,000 times stronger. And therefore, whatever form the commonwealth is under, the ruling power ought to govern by declared and received laws, and not by extemporary dictates and undetermined resolutions: for then mankind will be in a far worse condition than in the state of nature, if they shall have armed one, or a few men with the joint power of a multitude, to force them to obey at pleasure the exorbitant and unlimited decrees of their sudden thoughts, or unrestrained, and till that moment unknown wills, without having any measures set down which may guide and justify their actions: for all the power the government has, being only for the good of the society, as it ought not to be arbitrary and at pleasure, so it ought to be exercised by established and promulgated laws; that both the people may know their duty, and be safe and secure within the limits of the law; and the rulers too kept within their bounds, and not be tempted, by the power they have in their hands, to employ it to such purposes, and by such measures, as they would not have known, and own not willingly.

Sect. 138. Thirdly, The supreme power cannot take from any man any part of his property without his own consent: for the preservation of property being the end of government, and that for which men enter into society, it necessarily supposes and requires, that the people should have property, without which they must be supposed to lose that, by entering into society, which was the end for which they entered into it; too gross an absurdity for any man to own. Men therefore in society having property, they have such a right to the goods, which by the law of the community are their's, that no body hath a right to take their substance or any part of it from them, without their own consent: without this they have no property at all; for I have truly no property in that, which another can by right take from me, when he pleases, against my consent. Hence it is a mistake to think, that the supreme or legislative power of any commonwealth, can do what it will, and dispose of the estates of the subject arbitrarily, or take any part of them at pleasure. This is not much to be feared in governments where the legislative consists, wholly or in part, in assemblies which are variable, whose members, upon the dissolution of the assembly, are subjects under the common laws of their country, equally with the rest. But in governments, where the legislative is in one lasting assembly always in being, or in one man, as in absolute monarchies, there is danger still, that they will think themselves to have a distinct interest from the rest of the community; and so will be apt to increase their own riches and power, by taking what they think fit from the people: for a man's property is not at all secure, tho' there be good and equitable laws to set the bounds of it between him and his fellow subjects, if he who commands those subjects have power to take from any private man, what part he pleases of his property, and use and dispose of it as he thinks good.

Sect. 139. But government, into whatsoever hands it is put, being, as I have before shewed, intrusted with this condition, and for this end, that men might have and secure their properties; the prince, or senate, however it may have power to make laws, for the regulating of property between the subjects one amongst another, yet can never have a power to take to themselves the whole, or any part of the subjects property, without their own consent: for this would be in effect to leave them no property at all. And to let us see, that even absolute power, where it is necessary, is not arbitrary by being absolute, but is still limited by that reason, and confined to those ends, which required it in some cases to be absolute, we need look no farther than the common practice of martial discipline: for the preservation of the army, and in it of the whole commonwealth, requires an absolute obedience to the command of every superior officer, and it is justly death to disobey or dispute the most dangerous or unreasonable of them; but yet we see, that neither the serjeant, that could command a soldier to march up to the mouth of a cannon, or stand in a breach, where he is almost sure to perish, can command that soldier to give him one penny of his money; nor the general, that can condemn him to death for deserting his post, or for not obeying the most desperate orders, can yet, with all his absolute power of life and death, dispose of one farthing of that soldier's estate, or seize one jot of his goods; whom yet he can command any thing, and hang for the least disobedience; because such a blind obedience is necessary to that end, for which the commander has his power, viz. the preservation of the rest; but the disposing of his goods has nothing to do with it.

Sect. 140. It is true, governments cannot be supported without great charge, and it is fit every one who enjoys his share of the protection, should pay out of his estate his proportion for the maintenance of it. But still it must be with his own consent, i.e. the consent of the majority, giving it either by themselves, or their representatives chosen by them: for if any one shall claim a power to lay and levy taxes on the people, by his own authority, and without such consent of the people, he thereby invades the fundamental law of property, and subverts the end of government: for what property have I in that, which another may by right take, when he pleases, to himself?

Sect. 141. Fourthly, The legislative cannot transfer the power of making laws to any other hands: for it being but a delegated power from the people, they who have it cannot pass it over to others. The people alone can appoint the form of the commonwealth, which is by constituting the legislative, and appointing in whose hands that shall be. And when the people have said, We will submit to rules, and be governed by laws made by such men, and in such forms, no body else can say other men shall make laws for them; nor can the people be bound by any laws, but such as are enacted by those whom they have chosen, and authorized to make laws for them. The power of the legislative, being derived from the people by a positive voluntary grant and institution, can be no other than what that positive grant conveyed, which being only to make laws, and not to make legislators, the legislative can have no power to transfer their authority of making laws, and place it in other hands.

Sect. 142. These are the bounds which the trust, that is put in them by the society, and the law of God and nature, have set to the legislative power of every commonwealth, in all forms of government.

First, They are to govern by promulgated established laws, not to be varied in particular cases, but to have one rule for rich and poor, for the favourite at court, and the country man at plough.

Secondly, These laws also ought to be designed for no other end ultimately, but the good of the people.

Thirdly, They must not raise taxes on the property of the people, without the consent of the people, given by themselves, or their deputies. And this properly concerns only such governments where the legislative is always in being, or at least where the people have not reserved any part of the legislative to deputies, to be from time to time chosen by themselves.

Fourthly, The legislative neither must nor can transfer the power of making laws to any body else, or place it any where, but where the people have.

CHAPTER. XII.

OF THE LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND FEDERATIVE POWER OF THE COMMON-WEALTH.

Sect. 143. THE legislative power is that, which has a right to direct how the force of the commonwealth shall be employed for preserving the community and the members of it. But because those laws which are constantly to be executed, and whose force is always to continue, may be made in a little time; therefore there is no need, that the legislative should be always in being, not having always business to do. And because it may be too great a temptation to human frailty, apt to grasp at power, for the same persons, who have the power of making laws, to have also in their hands the power to execute them, whereby they may exempt themselves from obedience to the laws they make, and suit the law, both in its making, and execution, to their own private advantage, and thereby come to have a distinct interest from the rest of the community, contrary to the end of society and government: therefore in wellordered commonwealths, where the good of the whole is so considered, as it ought, the legislative power is put into the hands of divers persons, who duly assembled, have by themselves, or jointly with others, a power to make laws, which when they have done, being separated again, they are themselves subject to the laws they have made; which is a new and near tie upon them, to take care, that they make them for the public good.

Sect. 144. But because the laws, that are at once, and in a short time made, have a constant and lasting force, and need a perpetual execution, or an attendance thereunto; therefore it is necessary there should be a power always in being, which should see to the execution of the laws that are made, and remain in force. And thus the legislative and executive power come often to be separated.

Sect. 145. There is another power in every commonwealth, which one may call natural, because it is that which answers to the power every man naturally had before he entered into society: for though in a commonwealth the members of it are distinct persons still in reference to one another, and as such as governed by the laws of the society; yet in reference to the rest of mankind, they make one body, which is, as every member of it before was, still in the state of nature with the rest of mankind. Hence it is, that the controversies that happen between any man of the society with those that are out of it, are managed by the public; and an injury done to a member of their body, engages the whole in the reparation of it. So that under this consideration, the whole community is one body in the state of nature, in respect of all other states or persons out of its community.

Sect. 146. This therefore contains the power of war and peace, leagues and alliances, and all the transactions, with all persons and communities without the commonwealth, and may be called federative, if any one pleases. So the thing be understood, I am indifferent as to the name.

Sect. 147. These two powers, executive and federative, though they be really distinct in themselves, yet one comprehending the execution of the municipal laws of the society within its self, upon all that are parts of it; the other the management of the security and interest of the public without, with all those that it may receive benefit or damage from, yet they are always almost united. And though this federative power in the well or ill management of it be of great moment to the commonwealth, yet it is much less capable to be directed by antecedent, standing, positive laws, than the executive; and so must necessarily be left to the prudence and wisdom of those, whose hands it is in, to be managed for the public good: for the laws that concern subjects one amongst another, being to direct their actions, may well enough precede them. But what is to be done in reference to foreigners, depending much upon their actions, and the variation of designs and interests, must be left in great part to the prudence of those, who have this power committed to them, to be managed by the best of their skill, for the advantage of the commonwealth.

Sect. 148. Though, as I said, the executive and federative power of every community be really distinct in themselves, yet they are hardly to be separated, and placed at the same time, in the hands of distinct persons: for both of them requiring the force of the society for their exercise, it is almost impracticable to place the force of the commonwealth in distinct, and not subordinate hands; or that the executive and federative power should be placed in persons, that might act separately, whereby the force of the public would be under different commands: which would be apt some time or other to cause disorder and ruin.

CHAPTER. XIII.

OF THE SUBORDINATION OF THE POWERS OF THE COMMON-WEALTH.

Sect. 149. THOUGH in a constituted commonwealth, standing upon its own basis, and acting according to its own nature, that is, acting for the preservation of the community, there can be but one supreme power, which is the legislative, to which all the rest are and must be subordinate, yet the legislative being only a fiduciary power to act for certain ends, there remains still in the people a supreme power to remove or alter the legislative, when they find the legislative act contrary to the trust reposed in them: for all power given with trust for the attaining an end, being limited by that end, whenever that end is manifestly neglected, or opposed, the trust must necessarily be forfeited, and the power devolve into the hands of those that gave it, who may place it anew where they shall think best for their safety and security. And thus the community perpetually retains a supreme power of saving themselves from the attempts and designs of any body, even of their legislators, whenever they shall be so foolish, or so wicked, as to lay and carry on designs against the liberties and properties of the subject: for no man or society of men, having a power to deliver up their preservation, or consequently the means of it, to the absolute will and arbitrary dominion of another; when ever any one shall go about to bring them into such a slavish condition, they will always have a right to preserve, what they have not a power to part with; and to rid themselves of those, who invade this fundamental, sacred, and unalterable law of self-preservation, for which they entered into society. And thus the community may be said in this respect to be always the supreme power, but not as considered under any form of government, because this power of the people can never take place till the government be dissolved.

Sect. 150. In all cases, whilst the government subsists, the legislative is the supreme power: for what can give laws to another, must needs be superior to him; and since the legislative is no otherwise legislative of the society, but by the right it has to make laws for all the parts, and for every member of the society, prescribing rules to their actions, and giving power of execution, where they are transgressed, the legislative must needs be the supreme, and all other powers, in any members or parts of the society, derived from and subordinate to it.

Sect. 151. In some commonwealths, where the legislative is not always in being, and the executive is vested in a single person, who has also a share in the legislative; there that single person in a very tolerable sense may also be called supreme: not that he has in himself all the supreme power, which is that of law-making; but because he has in him the supreme execution, from whom all inferior magistrates derive all their several subordinate powers, or at least the greatest part of them: having also no legislative superior to him, there being no law to be made without his consent, which cannot be expected should ever subject him to the other part of the legislative, he is properly enough in this sense supreme. But yet it is to be observed, that tho' oaths of allegiance and fealty are taken to him, it is not to him as supreme legislator, but as supreme executor of the law, made by a joint power of him with others; allegiance being nothing but an obedience according to law, which when he violates, he has no right to obedience, nor can claim it otherwise than as the public person vested with the power of the law, and so is to be considered as the image, phantom, or representative of the commonwealth, acted by the will of the society, declared in its laws; and thus he has no will, no power, but that of the law. But when he quits this representation, this public will, and acts by his own private will, he degrades himself, and is but a single private person without power, and without will, that has any right to obedience; the members owing no obedience but to the public will of the society.

Sect. 152. The executive power, placed any where but in a person that has also a share in the legislative, is visibly subordinate and accountable to it, and may be at pleasure changed and displaced; so that it is not the supreme executive power, that is exempt from subordination, but the supreme executive power vested in one, who having a share in the legislative, has no distinct superior legislative to be subordinate and accountable to, farther than he himself shall join and consent; so that he is no more subordinate than he himself shall think fit, which one may certainly conclude will be but very little. Of other ministerial and subordinate powers in a commonwealth, we need not speak, they being so multiplied with infinite variety, in the different customs and constitutions of distinct commonwealths, that it is impossible to give a particular account of them all. Only thus much, which is necessary to our present purpose, we may take notice of concerning them, that they have no manner of authority, any of them, beyond what is by positive grant and commission delegated to them, and are all of them accountable to some other power in the commonwealth.

Sect. 153. It is not necessary, no, nor so much as convenient, that the legislative should be always in being; but absolutely necessary that the executive power should, because there is not always need of new laws to be made, but always need of execution of the laws that are made. When the legislative hath put the execution of the laws, they make, into other hands, they have a power still to resume it out of those hands, when they find cause, and to punish for any maladministration against the laws. The same holds also in regard of the federative power, that and the executive being both ministerial and subordinate to the legislative, which, as has been shewed, in a constituted commonwealth is the supreme. The legislative also in this case being supposed to consist of several persons, (for if it be a single person, it cannot but be always in being, and so will, as supreme, naturally have the supreme executive power, together with the legislative) may assemble, and exercise their legislature, at the times that either their original constitution, or their own adjournment, appoints, or when they please; if neither of these hath appointed any time, or there be no other way prescribed to convoke them: for the supreme power being placed in them by the people, it is always in them, and they may exercise it when they please, unless by their original constitution they are limited to certain seasons, or by an act of their supreme power they have adjourned to a certain time; and when that time comes, they have a right to assemble and act again.

Sect. 154. If the legislative, or any part of it, be made up of representatives chosen for that time by the people, which afterwards return into the ordinary state of subjects, and have no share in the legislature but upon a new choice, this power of chusing must also be exercised by the people, either at certain appointed seasons, or else when they are summoned to it; and in this latter case the power of convoking the legislative is ordinarily placed in the executive, and has one of these two limitations in respect of time: that either the original constitution requires their assembling and acting at certain intervals, and then the executive power does nothing but ministerially issue directions for their electing and assembling, according to due forms; or else it is left to his prudence to call them by new elections, when the occasions or exigencies of the public require the amendment of old, or making of new laws, or the redress or prevention of any inconveniencies, that lie on, or threaten the people.

Sect. 155. It may be demanded here, What if the executive power, being possessed of the force of the commonwealth, shall make use of that force to hinder the meeting and acting of the legislative, when the original constitution, or the public exigencies require it? I say, using force upon the people without authority, and contrary to the trust put in him that does so, is a state of war with the people, who have a right to reinstate their legislative in the exercise of their power: for having erected a legislative, with an intent they should exercise the power of making laws, either at certain set times, or when there is need of it, when they are hindered by any force from what is so necessary to the society, and wherein the safety and preservation of the people consists, the people have a right to remove it by force. In all states and conditions, the true remedy of force without authority, is to oppose force to it. The use of force without authority, always puts him that uses it into a state of war, as the aggressor, and renders him liable to be treated accordingly.

Sect. 156. The power of assembling and dismissing the legislative, placed in the executive, gives not the executive a superiority over it, but is a fiduciary trust placed in him, for the safety of the people, in a case where the uncertainty and variableness of human affairs could not bear a steady fixed rule: for it not being possible, that the first framers of the government should, by any foresight, be so much masters of future events, as to be able to prefix so just periods of return and duration to the assemblies of the legislative, in all times to come, that might exactly answer all the exigencies of the commonwealth; the best remedy could be found for this defect, was to trust this to the prudence of one who was always to be present, and whose business it was to watch over the public good. Constant frequent meetings of the legislative, and long continuations of their assemblies, without necessary occasion, could not but be burdensome to the people, and must necessarily in time produce more dangerous inconveniencies, and yet the quick turn of affairs might be sometimes such as to need their present help: any delay of their convening might endanger the public; and sometimes too their business might be so great, that the limited time of their sitting might be too short for their work, and rob the public of that benefit which could be had only from their mature deliberation. What then could be done in this case to prevent the community from being exposed some time or other to eminent hazard, on one side or the other, by fixed intervals and periods, set to the meeting and acting of the legislative, but to intrust it to the prudence of some, who being present, and acquainted with the state of public affairs, might make use of this prerogative for the public good? and where else could this be so well placed as in his hands, who was intrusted with the execution of the laws for the same end? Thus supposing the regulation of times for the assembling and sitting of the legislative, not settled by the original constitution, it naturally fell into the hands of the executive, not as an arbitrary power depending on his good pleasure, but with this trust always to have it exercised only for the public weal, as the occurrences of times and change of affairs might require. Whether settled periods of their convening, or a liberty left to the prince for convoking the legislative, or perhaps a mixture of both, hath the least inconvenience attending it, it is not my business here to inquire, but only to shew, that though the executive power may have the prerogative of convoking and dissolving such conventions of the legislative, yet it is not thereby superior to it.

Sect. 157. Things of this world are in so constant a flux, that nothing remains long in the same state. Thus people, riches, trade, power, change their stations, flourishing mighty cities come to ruin, and prove in times neglected desolate corners, whilst other unfrequented places grow into populous countries, filled with wealth and inhabitants. But things not always changing equally, and private interest often keeping up customs and privileges, when the reasons of them are ceased, it often comes to pass, that in governments, where part of the legislative consists of representatives chosen by the people, that in tract of time this representation becomes very unequal and disproportionate to the reasons it was at first established upon. To what gross absurdities the following of custom, when reason has left it, may lead, we may be satisfied, when we see the bare name of a town, of which there remains not so much as the ruins, where scarce so much housing as a sheepcote, or more inhabitants than a shepherd is to be found, sends as many representatives to the grand assembly of law-makers, as a whole county numerous in people, and powerful in riches. This strangers stand amazed at, and every one must confess needs a remedy; tho' most think it hard to find one, because the constitution of the legislative being the original and supreme act of the society, antecedent to all positive laws in it, and depending wholly on the people, no inferior power can alter it. And therefore the people, when the legislative is once constituted, having, in such a government as we have been speaking of, no power to act as long as the government stands; this inconvenience is thought incapable of a remedy.

Sect. 158. Salus populi suprema lex, is certainly so just and fundamental a rule, that he, who sincerely follows it, cannot dangerously err. If therefore the executive, who has the power of convoking the legislative, observing rather the true proportion, than fashion of representation, regulates, not by old custom, but true reason, the number of members, in all places that have a right to be distinctly represented, which no part of the people however incorporated can pretend to, but in proportion to the assistance which it affords to the public, it cannot be judged to have set up a new legislative, but to have restored the old and true one, and to have rectified the disorders which succession of time had insensibly, as well as inevitably introduced: For it being the interest as well as intention of the people, to have a fair and equal representative; whoever brings it nearest to that, is an undoubted friend to, and establisher of the government, and cannot miss the consent and approbation of the community; prerogative being nothing but a power, in the hands of the prince, to provide for the public good, in such cases, which depending upon unforeseen and uncertain occurrences, certain and unalterable laws could not safely direct; whatsoever shall be done manifestly for the good of the people, and the establishing the government upon its true foundations, is, and always will be, just prerogative, The power of erecting new corporations, and therewith new representatives, carries with it a supposition, that in time the measures of representation might vary, and those places have a just right to be represented which before had none; and by the same reason, those cease to have a right, and be too inconsiderable for such a privilege, which before had it. 'Tis not a change from the present state, which perhaps corruption or decay has introduced, that makes an inroad upon the government, but the tendency of it to injure or oppress the people, and to set up one part or party, with a distinction from, and an unequal subjection of the rest. Whatsoever cannot but be acknowledged to be of advantage to the society, and people in general, upon just and lasting measures, will always, when done, justify itself; and whenever the people shall chuse their representatives upon just and undeniably equal measures, suitable to the original frame of the government, it cannot be doubted to be the will and act of the society, whoever permitted or caused them so to do.

CHAPTER. XIV.

OF PREROGATIVE.

Sect. 159. WHERE the legislative and executive power are in distinct hands, (as they are in all moderated monarchies, and well-framed governments) there the good of the society requires, that several things should be left to the discretion of him that has the executive power: for the legislators not being able to foresee, and provide by laws, for all that may be useful to the community, the executor of the laws having the power in his hands, has by the common law of nature a right to make use of it for the good of the society, in many cases, where the municipal law has given no direction, till the legislative can conveniently be assembled to provide for it. Many things there are, which the law can by no means provide for; and those must necessarily be left to the discretion of him that has the executive power in his hands, to be ordered by him as the public good and advantage shall require: nay, it is fit that the laws themselves should in some cases give way to the executive power, or rather to this fundamental law of nature and government, viz. That as much as may be, all the members of the society are to be preserved: for since many accidents may happen, wherein a strict and rigid observation of the laws may do harm; (as not to pull down an innocent man's house to stop the fire, when the next to it is burning) and a man may come sometimes within the reach of the law, which makes no distinction of persons, by an action that may deserve reward and pardon; 'tis fit the ruler should have a power, in many cases, to mitigate the severity of the law, and pardon some offenders: for the end of government being the preservation of all, as much as may be, even the guilty are to be spared, where it can prove no prejudice to the innocent.

Sect. 160. This power to act according to discretion, for the public good, without the prescription of the law, and sometimes even against it, is that which is called prerogative: for since in some governments the lawmaking power is not always in being, and is usually too numerous, and so too slow, for the dispatch requisite to execution; and because also it is impossible to foresee, and so by laws to provide for, all accidents and necessities that may concern the public, or to make such laws as will do no harm, if they are executed with an inflexible rigour, on all occasions, and upon all persons that may come in their way; therefore there is a latitude left to the executive power, to do many things of choice which the laws do not prescribe.

Sect. 161. This power, whilst employed for the benefit of the community, and suitably to the trust and ends of the government, is undoubted prerogative, and never is questioned: for the people are very seldom or never scrupulous or nice in the point; they are far from examining prerogative, whilst it is in any tolerable degree employed for the use it was meant, that is, for the good of the people, and not manifestly against it: but if there comes to be a question between the executive power and the people, about a thing claimed as a prerogative; the tendency of the exercise of such prerogative to the good or hurt of the people, will easily decide that question.

Sect. 162. It is easy to conceive, that in the infancy of governments, when commonwealths differed little from families in number of people, they differed from them too but little in number of laws: and the governors, being as the fathers of them, watching over them for their good, the government was almost all prerogative. A few established laws served the turn, and the discretion and care of the ruler supplied the rest. But when mistake or flattery prevailed with weak princes to make use of this power for private ends of their own, and not for the public good, the people were fain by express laws to get prerogative determined in those points wherein they found disadvantage from it: and thus declared limitations of prerogative were by the people found necessary in cases which they and their ancestors had left, in the utmost latitude, to the wisdom of those princes who made no other but a right use of it, that is, for the good of their people.

Sect. 163. And therefore they have a very wrong notion of government, who say, that the people have encroached upon the prerogative, when they have got any part of it to be defined by positive laws: for in so doing they have not pulled from the prince any thing that of right belonged to him, but only declared, that that power which they indefinitely left in his or his ancestors hands, to be exercised for their good, was not a thing which they intended him when he used it otherwise: for the end of government being the good of the community, whatsoever alterations are made in it, tending to that end, cannot be an encroachment upon any body, since no body in government can have a right tending to any other end: and those only are encroachments which prejudice or hinder the public good. Those who say otherwise, speak as if the prince had a distinct and separate interest from the good of the community, and was not made for it; the root and source from which spring almost all those evils and disorders which happen in kingly governments. And indeed, if that be so, the people under his government are not a society of rational creatures, entered into a community for their mutual good; they are not such as have set rulers over themselves, to guard, and promote that good; but are to be looked on as an herd of inferior creatures under the dominion of a master, who keeps them and works them for his own pleasure or profit. If men were so void of reason, and brutish, as to enter into society upon such terms, prerogative might indeed be, what some men would have it, an arbitrary power to do things hurtful to the people.

Sect. 164. But since a rational creature cannot be supposed, when free, to put himself into subjection to another, for his own harm; (though, where he finds a good and wise ruler, he may not perhaps think it either necessary or useful to set precise bounds to his power in all things) prerogative can be nothing but the people's permitting their rulers to do several things, of their own free choice, where the law was silent, and sometimes too against the direct letter of the law, for the public good; and their acquiescing in it when so done: for as a good prince, who is mindful of the trust put into his hands, and careful of the good of his people, cannot have too much prerogative, that is, power to do good; so a weak and ill prince, who would claim that power which his predecessors exercised without the direction of the law, as a prerogative belonging to him by right of his office, which he may exercise at his pleasure, to make or promote an interest distinct from that of the public, gives the people an occasion to claim their right, and limit that power, which, whilst it was exercised for their good, they were content should be tacitly allowed.

Sect. 165. And therefore he that will look into the history of England, will find, that prerogative was always largest in the hands of our wisest and best princes; because the people, observing the whole tendency of their actions to be the public good, contested not what was done without law to that end: or, if any human frailty or mistake (for princes are but men, made as others) appeared in some small declinations from that end; yet 'twas visible, the main of their conduct tended to nothing but the care of the public. The people therefore, finding reason to be satisfied with these princes, whenever they acted without, or contrary to the letter of the law, acquiesced in what they did, and, without the least complaint, let them inlarge their prerogative as they pleased, judging rightly, that they did nothing herein to the prejudice of their laws, since they acted conformable to the foundation and end of all laws, the public good.

Sect. 166. Such god-like princes indeed had some title to arbitrary power by that argument, that would prove absolute monarchy the best government, as that which God himself governs the universe by; because such kings partake of his wisdom and goodness. Upon this is founded that saying, That the reigns of good princes have been always most dangerous to the liberties of their people: for when their successors, managing the government with different thoughts, would draw the actions of those good rulers into precedent, and make them the standard of their prerogative, as if what had been done only for the good of the people was a right in them to do, for the harm of the people, if they so pleased; it has often occasioned contest, and sometimes public disorders, before the people could recover their original right, and get that to be declared not to be prerogative, which truly was never so; since it is impossible that any body in the society should ever have a right to do the people harm; though it be very possible, and reasonable, that the people should not go about to set any bounds to the prerogative of those kings, or rulers, who themselves transgressed not the bounds of the public good: for prerogative is nothing but the power of doing public good without a rule.

Sect. 167. The power of calling parliaments in England, as to precise time, place, and duration, is certainly a prerogative of the king, but still with this trust, that it shall be made use of for the good of the nation, as the exigencies of the times, and variety of occasions, shall require: for it being impossible to foresee which should always be the fittest place for them to assemble in, and what the best season; the choice of these was left with the executive power, as might be most subservient to the public good, and best suit the ends of parliaments.

Sect. 168. The old question will be asked in this matter of prerogative, But who shall be judge when this power is made a right use of one answer: between an executive power in being, with such a prerogative, and a legislative that depends upon his will for their convening, there can be no judge on earth; as there can be none between the legislative and the people, should either the executive, or the legislative, when they have got the power in their hands, design, or go about to enslave or destroy them. The people have no other remedy in this, as in all other cases where they have no judge on earth, but to appeal to heaven: for the rulers, in such attempts, exercising a power the people never put into their hands, (who can never be supposed to consent that any body should rule over them for their harm) do that which they have not a right to do. And where the body of the people, or any single man, is deprived of their right, or is under the exercise of a power without right, and have no appeal on earth, then they have a liberty to appeal to heaven, whenever they judge the cause of sufficient moment. And therefore, though the people cannot be judge, so as to have, by the constitution of that society, any superior power, to determine and give effective sentence in the case; yet they have, by a law antecedent and paramount to all positive laws of men, reserved that ultimate determination to themselves which belongs to all mankind, where there lies no appeal on earth, viz. to judge, whether they have just cause to make their appeal to heaven. And this judgment they cannot part with, it being out of a man's power so to submit himself to another, as to give him a liberty to destroy him; God and nature never allowing a man so to abandon himself, as to neglect his own preservation: and since he cannot take away his own life, neither can he give another power to take it. Nor let any one think, this lays a perpetual foundation for disorder; for this operates not, till the inconveniency is so great, that the majority feel it, and are weary of it, and find a necessity to have it amended. But this the executive power, or wise princes, never need come in the danger of: and it is the thing, of all others, they have most need to avoid, as of all others the most perilous.

CHAPTER. XV.

OF PATERNAL, POLITICAL, AND DESPOTICAL POWER, CONSIDERED TOGETHER.

Sect. 169. THOUGH I have had occasion to speak of these separately before, yet the great mistakes of late about government, having, as I suppose, arisen from confounding these distinct powers one with another, it may not, perhaps, be amiss to consider them here together.

Sect. 170. First, then, Paternal or parental power is nothing but that which parents have over their children, to govern them for the children's good, till they come to the use of reason, or a state of knowledge, wherein they may be supposed capable to understand that rule, whether it be the law of nature, or the municipal law of their country, they are to govern themselves by: capable, I say, to know it, as well as several others, who live as freemen under that law. The affection and tenderness which God hath planted in the breast of parents towards their children, makes it evident, that this is not intended to be a severe arbitrary government, but only for the help, instruction, and preservation of their offspring. But happen it as it will, there is, as I have proved, no reason why it should be thought to extend to life and death, at any time, over their children, more than over any body else; neither can there be any pretence why this parental power should keep the child, when grown to a man, in subjection to the will of his parents, any farther than having received life and education from his parents, obliges him to respect, honour, gratitude, assistance and support, all his life, to both father and mother. And thus, 'tis true, the paternal is a natural government, but not at all extending itself to the ends and jurisdictions of that which is political. The power of the father doth not reach at all to the property of the child, which is only in his own disposing.

Sect. 171. Secondly, Political power is that power, which every man having in the state of nature, has given up into the hands of the society, and therein to the governors, whom the society hath set over itself, with this express or tacit trust, that it shall be employed for their good, and the preservation of their property: now this power, which every man has in the state of nature, and which he parts with to the society in all such cases where the society can secure him, is to use such means, for the preserving of his own property, as he thinks good, and nature allows him; and to punish the breach of the law of nature in others, so as (according to the best of his reason) may most conduce to the preservation of himself, and the rest of mankind. So that the end and measure of this power, when in every man's hands in the state of nature, being the preservation of all of his society, that is, all mankind in general, it can have no other end or measure, when in the hands of the magistrate, but to preserve the members of that society in their lives, liberties, and possessions; and so cannot be an absolute, arbitrary power over their lives and fortunes, which are as much as possible to be preserved; but a power to make laws, and annex such penalties to them, as may tend to the preservation of the whole, by cutting off those parts, and those only, which are so corrupt, that they threaten the sound and healthy, without which no severity is lawful. And this power has its original only from compact and agreement, and the mutual consent of those who make up the community.

Sect. 172. Thirdly, Despotical power is an absolute, arbitrary power one man has over another, to take away his life, whenever he pleases. This is a power, which neither nature gives, for it has made no such distinction between one man and another; nor compact can convey: for man not having such an arbitrary power over his own life, cannot give another man such a power over it; but it is the effect only of forfeiture, which the aggressor makes of his own life, when he puts himself into the state of war with another: for having quitted reason, which God hath given to be the rule betwixt man and man, and the common bond whereby human kind is united into one fellowship and society; and having renounced the way of peace which that teaches, and made use of the force of war, to compass his unjust ends upon another, where he has no right; and so revolting from his own kind to that of beasts, by making force, which is their's, to be his rule of right, he renders himself liable to be destroyed by the injured person, and the rest of mankind, that will join with him in the execution of justice, as any other wild beast, or noxious brute, with whom mankind can have neither society nor security*. And thus captives, taken in a just and lawful war, and such only, are subject to a despotical power, which, as it arises not from compact, so neither is it capable of any, but is the state of war continued: for what compact can be made with a man that is not master of his own life? what condition can he perform? and if he be once allowed to be master of his own life, the despotical, arbitrary power of his master ceases. He that is master of himself, and his own life, has a right too to the means of preserving it; so that as soon as compact enters, slavery ceases, and he so far quits his absolute power, and puts an end to the state of war, who enters into conditions with his captive.

Sect. 173. Nature gives the first of these, viz. paternal power to parents for the benefit of their children during their minority, to supply their want of ability, and understanding how to manage their property. (By property I must be understood here, as in other places, to mean that property which men have in their persons as well as goods.) Voluntary agreement gives the second, viz. political power to governors for the benefit of their subjects, to secure them in the possession and use of their properties. And forfeiture gives the third despotical power to lords for their own benefit, over those who are stripped of all property.

Sect. 174. He, that shall consider the distinct rise and extent, and the different ends of these several powers, will plainly see, that paternal power comes as far short of that of the magistrate, as despotical exceeds it; and that absolute dominion, however placed, is so far from being one kind of civil society, that it is as inconsistent with it, as slavery is with property. Paternal power is only where minority makes the child incapable to manage his property; political, where men have property in their own disposal; and despotical, over such as have no property at all.

CHAPTER. XVI.

OF CONQUEST.

Sect. 175. THOUGH governments can originally have no other rise than that before mentioned, nor polities be founded on any thing but the consent of the people; yet such have been the disorders ambition has filled the world with, that in the noise of war, which makes so great a part of the history of mankind, this consent is little taken notice of: and therefore many have mistaken the force of arms for the consent of the people, and reckon conquest as one of the originals of government. But conquest is as far from setting up any government, as demolishing an house is from building a new one in the place. Indeed, it often makes way for a new frame of a commonwealth, by destroying the former; but, without the consent of the people, can never erect a new one.

Sect. 176. That the aggressor, who puts himself into the state of war with another, and unjustly invades another man's right, can, by such an unjust war, never come to have a right over the conquered, will be easily agreed by all men, who will not think, that robbers and pyrates have a right of empire over whomsoever they have force enough to master; or that men are bound by promises, which unlawful force extorts from them. Should a robber break into my house, and with a dagger at my throat make me seal deeds to convey my estate to him, would this give him any title? Just such a title, by his sword, has an unjust conqueror, who forces me into submission. The injury and the crime is equal, whether committed by the wearer of a crown, or some petty villain. The title of the offender, and the number of his followers, make no difference in the offence, unless it be to aggravate it. The only difference is, great robbers punish little ones, to keep them in their obedience; but the great ones are rewarded with laurels and triumphs, because they are too big for the weak hands of justice in this world, and have the power in their own possession, which should punish offenders. What is my remedy against a robber, that so broke into my house? Appeal to the law for justice. But perhaps justice is denied, or I am crippled and cannot stir, robbed and have not the means to do it. If God has taken away all means of seeking remedy, there is nothing left but patience. But my son, when able, may seek the relief of the law, which I am denied: he or his son may renew his appeal, till he recover his right. But the conquered, or their children, have no court, no arbitrator on earth to appeal to. Then they may appeal, as Jephtha did, to heaven, and repeat their appeal till they have recovered the native right of their ancestors, which was, to have such a legislative over them, as the majority should approve, and freely acquiesce in. If it be objected, This would cause endless trouble; I answer, no more than justice does, where she lies open to all that appeal to her. He that troubles his neighbour without a cause, is punished for it by the justice of the court he appeals to: and he that appeals to heaven must be sure he has right on his side; and a right too that is worth the trouble and cost of the appeal, as he will answer at a tribunal that cannot be deceived, and will be sure to retribute to every one according to the mischiefs he hath created to his fellow subjects; that is, any part of mankind: from whence it is plain, that he that conquers in an unjust war can thereby have no title to the subjection and obedience of the conquered.

Sect. 177. But supposing victory favours the right side, let us consider a conqueror in a lawful war, and see what power he gets, and over whom.

First, It is plain he gets no power by his conquest over those that conquered with him. They that fought on his side cannot suffer by the conquest, but must at least be as much freemen as they were before. And most commonly they serve upon terms, and on condition to share with their leader, and enjoy a part of the spoil, and other advantages that attend the conquering sword; or at least have a part of the subdued country bestowed upon them. And the conquering people are not, I hope, to be slaves by conquest, and wear their laurels only to shew they are sacrifices to their leaders triumph. They that found absolute monarchy upon the title of the sword, make their heroes, who are the founders of such monarchies, arrant Draw-can-sirs, and forget they had any officers and soldiers that fought on their side in the battles they won, or assisted them in the subduing, or shared in possessing, the countries they mastered. We are told by some, that the English monarchy is founded in the Norman conquest, and that our princes have thereby a title to absolute dominion: which if it were true, (as by the history it appears otherwise) and that William had a right to make war on this island; yet his dominion by conquest could reach no farther than to the Saxons and Britons, that were then inhabitants of this country. The Normans that came with him, and helped to conquer, and all descended from them, are freemen, and no subjects by conquest; let that give what dominion it will. And if I, or any body else, shall claim freedom, as derived from them, it will be very hard to prove the contrary: and it is plain, the law, that has made no distinction between the one and the other, intends not there should be any difference in their freedom or privileges.

Sect. 178. But supposing, which seldom happens, that the conquerors and conquered never incorporate into one people, under the same laws and freedom; let us see next what power a lawful conqueror has over the subdued: and that I say is purely despotical. He has an absolute power over the lives of those who by an unjust war have forfeited them; but not over the lives or fortunes of those who engaged not in the war, nor over the possessions even of those who were actually engaged in it.

Sect. 179. Secondly, I say then the conqueror gets no power but only over those who have actually assisted, concurred, or consented to that unjust force that is used against him: for the people having given to their governors no power to do an unjust thing, such as is to make an unjust war, (for they never had such a power in themselves) they ought not to be charged as guilty of the violence and unjustice that is committed in an unjust war, any farther than they actually abet it; no more than they are to be thought guilty of any violence or oppression their governors should use upon the people themselves, or any part of their fellow subjects, they having empowered them no more to the one than to the other. Conquerors, it is true, seldom trouble themselves to make the distinction, but they willingly permit the confusion of war to sweep all together: but yet this alters not the right; for the conquerors power over the lives of the conquered, being only because they have used force to do, or maintain an injustice, he can have that power only over those who have concurred in that force; all the rest are innocent; and he has no more title over the people of that country, who have done him no injury, and so have made no forfeiture of their lives, than he has over any other, who, without any injuries or provocations, have lived upon fair terms with him.

Sect. 180. Thirdly, The power a conqueror gets over those he overcomes in a just war, is perfectly despotical: he has an absolute power over the lives of those, who, by putting themselves in a state of war, have forfeited them; but he has not thereby a right and title to their possessions. This I doubt not, but at first sight will seem a strange doctrine, it being so quite contrary to the practice of the world; there being nothing more familiar in speaking of the dominion of countries, than to say such an one conquered it; as if conquest, without any more ado, conveyed a right of possession. But when we consider, that the practice of the strong and powerful, how universal soever it may be, is seldom the rule of right, however it be one part of the subjection of the conquered, not to argue against the conditions cut out to them by the conquering sword.

Sect. 181. Though in all war there be usually a complication of force and damage, and the aggressor seldom fails to harm the estate, when he uses force against the persons of those he makes war upon; yet it is the use of force only that puts a man into the state of war: for whether by force he begins the injury, or else having quietly, and by fraud, done the injury, he refuses to make reparation, and by force maintains it, (which is the same thing, as at first to have done it by force) it is the unjust use of force that makes the war: for he that breaks open my house, and violently turns me out of doors; or having peaceably got in, by force keeps me out, does in effect the same thing; supposing we are in such a state, that we have no common judge on earth, whom I may appeal to, and to whom we are both obliged to submit: for of such I am now speaking. It is the unjust use of force then, that puts a man into the state of war with another; and thereby he that is guilty of it makes a forfeiture of his life: for quitting reason, which is the rule given between man and man, and using force, the way of beasts, he becomes liable to be destroyed by him he uses force against, as any savage ravenous beast, that is dangerous to his being.

Sect. 182. But because the miscarriages of the father are no faults of the children, and they may be rational and peaceable, notwithstanding the brutishness and injustice of the father; the father, by his miscarriages and violence, can forfeit but his own life, but involves not his children in his guilt or destruction. His goods, which nature, that willeth the preservation of all mankind as much as is possible, hath made to belong to the children to keep them from perishing, do still continue to belong to his children: for supposing them not to have joined in the war, either thro' infancy, absence, or choice, they have done nothing to forfeit them: nor has the conqueror any right to take them away, by the bare title of having subdued him that by force attempted his destruction; though perhaps he may have some right to them, to repair the damages he has sustained by the war, and the defence of his own right; which how far it reaches to the possessions of the conquered, we shall see by and by. So that he that by conquest has a right over a man's person to destroy him if he pleases, has not thereby a right over his estate to possess and enjoy it: for it is the brutal force the aggressor has used, that gives his adversary a right to take away his life, and destroy him if he pleases, as a noxious creature; but it is damage sustained that alone gives him title to another man's goods: for though I may kill a thief that sets on me in the highway, yet I may not (which seems less) take away his money, and let him go: this would be robbery on my side. His force, and the state of war he put himself in, made him forfeit his life, but gave me no title to his goods. The right then of conquest extends only to the lives of those who joined in the war, not to their estates, but only in order to make reparation for the damages received, and the charges of the war, and that too with reservation of the right of the innocent wife and children.

Sect. 183. Let the conqueror have as much justice on his side, as could be supposed, he has no right to seize more than the vanquished could forfeit: his life is at the victor's mercy; and his service and goods he may appropriate, to make himself reparation; but he cannot take the goods of his wife and children; they too had a title to the goods he enjoyed, and their shares in the estate he possessed: for example, I in the state of nature (and all commonwealths are in the state of nature one with another) have injured another man, and refusing to give satisfaction, it comes to a state of war, wherein my defending by force what I had gotten unjustly, makes me the aggressor. I am conquered: my life, it is true, as forfeit, is at mercy, but not my wife's and children's. They made not the war, nor assisted in it. I could not forfeit their lives; they were not mine to forfeit. My wife had a share in my estate; that neither could I forfeit. And my children also, being born of me, had a right to be maintained out of my labour or substance. Here then is the case: the conqueror has a title to reparation for damages received, and the children have a title to their father's estate for their subsistence: for as to the wife's share, whether her own labour, or compact, gave her a title to it, it is plain, her husband could not forfeit what was her's. What must be done in the case? I answer; the fundamental law of nature being, that all, as much as may be, should be preserved, it follows, that if there be not enough fully to satisfy both, viz, for the conqueror's losses, and children's maintenance, he that hath, and to spare, must remit something of his full satisfaction, and give way to the pressing and preferable title of those who are in danger to perish without it.

Sect. 184. But supposing the charge and damages of the war are to be made up to the conqueror, to the utmost farthing; and that the children of the vanquished, spoiled of all their father's goods, are to be left to starve and perish; yet the satisfying of what shall, on this score, be due to the conqueror, will scarce give him a title to any country he shall conquer: for the damages of war can scarce amount to the value of any considerable tract of land, in any part of the world, where all the land is possessed, and none lies waste. And if I have not taken away the conqueror's land, which, being vanquished, it is impossible I should; scarce any other spoil I have done him can amount to the value of mine, supposing it equally cultivated, and of an extent any way coming near what I had overrun of his. The destruction of a year's product or two (for it seldom reaches four or five) is the utmost spoil that usually can be done: for as to money, and such riches and treasure taken away, these are none of nature's goods, they have but a fantastical imaginary value: nature has put no such upon them: they are of no more account by her standard, than the wampompeke of the Americans to an European prince, or the silver money of Europe would have been formerly to an American. And five years product is not worth the perpetual inheritance of land, where all is possessed, and none remains waste, to be taken up by him that is disseized: which will be easily granted, if one do but take away the imaginary value of money, the disproportion being more than between five and five hundred; though, at the same time, half a year's product is more worth than the inheritance, where there being more land than the inhabitants possess and make use of, any one has liberty to make use of the waste: but there conquerors take little care to possess themselves of the lands of the vanquished, No damage therefore, that men in the state of nature (as all princes and governments are in reference to one another) suffer from one another, can give a conqueror power to dispossess the posterity of the vanquished, and turn them out of that inheritance, which ought to be the possession of them and their descendants to all generations. The conqueror indeed will be apt to think himself master: and it is the very condition of the subdued not to be able to dispute their right. But if that be all, it gives no other title than what bare force gives to the stronger over the weaker: and, by this reason, he that is strongest will have a right to whatever he pleases to seize on.

Sect. 185. Over those then that joined with him in the war, and over those of the subdued country that opposed him not, and the posterity even of those that did, the conqueror, even in a just war, hath, by his conquest, no right of dominion: they are free from any subjection to him, and if their former government be dissolved, they are at liberty to begin and erect another to themselves.

Sect. 186. The conqueror, it is true, usually, by the force he has over them, compels them, with a sword at their breasts, to stoop to his conditions, and submit to such a government as he pleases to afford them; but the enquiry is, what right he has to do so? If it be said, they submit by their own consent, then this allows their own consent to be necessary to give the conqueror a title to rule over them. It remains only to be considered, whether promises extorted by force, without right, can be thought consent, and how far they bind. To which I shall say, they bind not at all; because whatsoever another gets from me by force, I still retain the right of, and he is obliged presently to restore. He that forces my horse from me, ought presently to restore him, and I have still a right to retake him. By the same reason, he that forced a promise from me, ought presently to restore it, i.e. quit me of the obligation of it; or I may resume it myself, i.e. chuse whether I will perform it: for the law of nature laying an obligation on me only by the rules she prescribes, cannot oblige me by the violation of her rules: such is the extorting any thing from me by force. Nor does it at all alter the case to say, I gave my promise, no more than it excuses the force, and passes the right, when I put my hand in my pocket, and deliver my purse myself to a thief, who demands it with a pistol at my breast.

Sect. 187. From all which it follows, that the government of a conqueror, imposed by force on the subdued, against whom he had no right of war, or who joined not in the war against him, where he had right, has no obligation upon them.

Sect. 188. But let us suppose, that all the men of that community, being all members of the same body politic, may be taken to have joined in that unjust war wherein they are subdued, and so their lives are at the mercy of the conqueror.

Sect. 189. I say this concerns not their children who are in their minority: for since a father hath not, in himself, a power over the life or liberty of his child, no act of his can possibly forfeit it. So that the children, whatever may have happened to the fathers, are freemen, and the absolute power of the conqueror reaches no farther than the persons of the men that were subdued by him, and dies with them: and should he govern them as slaves, subjected to his absolute arbitrary power, he has no such right of dominion over their children. He can have no power over them but by their own consent, whatever he may drive them to say or do; and he has no lawfull authority, whilst force, and not choice, compels them to submission.

Sect. 190. Every man is born with a double right: first, a right of freedom to his person, which no other man has a power over, but the free disposal of it lies in himself. Secondly, a right, before any other man, to inherit with his brethren his father's goods.

Sect. 191. By the first of these, a man is naturally free from subjection to any government, tho' he be born in a place under its jurisdiction; but if he disclaim the lawful government of the country he was born in, he must also quit the right that belonged to him by the laws of it, and the possessions there descending to him from his ancestors, if it were a government made by their consent.

Sect. 192. By the second, the inhabitants of any country, who are descended, and derive a title to their estates from those who are subdued, and had a government forced upon them against their free consents, retain a right to the possession of their ancestors, though they consent not freely to the government, whose hard conditions were by force imposed on the possessors of that country: for the first conqueror never having had a title to the land of that country, the people who are the descendants of, or claim under those who were forced to submit to the yoke of a government by constraint, have always a right to shake it off, and free themselves from the usurpation or tyranny which the sword hath brought in upon them, till their rulers put them under such a frame of government as they willingly and of choice consent to. Who doubts but the Grecian Christians, descendants of the ancient possessors of that country, may justly cast off the Turkish yoke, which they have so long groaned under, whenever they have an opportunity to do it? For no government can have a right to obedience from a people who have not freely consented to it; which they can never be supposed to do, till either they are put in a full state of liberty to chuse their government and governors, or at least till they have such standing laws, to which they have by themselves or their representatives given their free consent, and also till they are allowed their due property, which is so to be proprietors of what they have, that no body can take away any part of it without their own consent, without which, men under any government are not in the state of freemen, but are direct slaves under the force of war.

Sect. 193. But granting that the conqueror in a just war has a right to the estates, as well as power over the persons, of the conquered; which, it is plain, he hath not: nothing of absolute power will follow from hence, in the continuance of the government; because the descendants of these being all freemen, if he grants them estates and possessions to inhabit his country, (without which it would be worth nothing) whatsoever he grants them, they have, so far as it is granted, property in. The nature whereof is, that without a man's own consent it cannot be taken from him.

Sect. 194. Their persons are free by a native right, and their properties, be they more or less, are their own, and at their own dispose, and not at his; or else it is no property. Supposing the conqueror gives to one man a thousand acres, to him and his heirs for ever; to another he lets a thousand acres for his life, under the rent of 50£. or 500£. per ann. has not the one of these a right to his thousand acres for ever, and the other, during his life, paying the said rent? and hath not the tenant for life a property in all that he gets over and above his rent, by his labour and industry during the said term, supposing it be double the rent? Can any one say, the king, or conqueror, after his grant, may by his power of conqueror take away all, or part of the land from the heirs of one, or from the other during his life, he paying the rent? or can he take away from either the goods or money they have got upon the said land, at his pleasure? If he can, then all free and voluntary contracts cease, and are void in the world; there needs nothing to dissolve them at any time, but power enough: and all the grants and promises of men in power are but mockery and collusion: for can there be any thing more ridiculous than to say, I give you and your's this for ever, and that in the surest and most solemn way of conveyance can be devised; and yet it is to be understood, that I have right, if I please, to take it away from you again to morrow?

Sect. 195. I will not dispute now whether princes are exempt from the laws of their country; but this I am sure, they owe subjection to the laws of God and nature. No body, no power, can exempt them from the obligations of that eternal law. Those are so great, and so strong, in the case of promises, that omnipotency itself can be tied by them. Grants, promises, and oaths, are bonds that hold the Almighty: whatever some flatterers say to princes of the world, who all together, with all their people joined to them, are, in comparison of the great God, but as a drop of the bucket, or a dust on the balance, inconsiderable, nothing!

Sect. 196. The short of the case in conquest is this: the conqueror, if he have a just cause, has a despotical right over the persons of all, that actually aided, and concurred in the war against him, and a right to make up his damage and cost out of their labour and estates, so he injure not the right of any other. Over the rest of the people, if there were any that consented not to the war, and over the children of the captives themselves, or the possessions of either, he has no power; and so can have, by virtue of conquest, no lawful title himself to dominion over them, or derive it to his posterity; but is an aggressor, if he attempts upon their properties, and thereby puts himself in a state of war against them, and has no better a right of principality, he, nor any of his successors, than Hingar, or Hubba, the Danes, had here in England; or Spartacus, had he conquered Italy, would have had; which is to have their yoke cast off, as soon as God shall give those under their subjection courage and opportunity to do it. Thus, notwithstanding whatever title the kings of Assyria had over Judah, by the sword, God assisted Hezekiah to throw off the dominion of that conquering empire. And the lord was with Hezekiah, and he prospered; wherefore he went forth, and he rebelled against the king of Assyria, and served him not, 2 Kings xviii. 7. Whence it is plain, that shaking off a power, which force, and not right, hath set over any one, though it hath the name of rebellion, yet is no offence before God, but is that which he allows and countenances, though even promises and covenants, when obtained by force, have intervened: for it is very probable, to any one that reads the story of Ahaz and Hezekiah attentively, that the Assyrians subdued Ahaz, and deposed him, and made Hezekiah king in his father's lifetime; and that Hezekiah by agreement had done him homage, and paid him tribute all this time.

CHAPTER. XVII.

OF USURPATION.

Sect. 197. AS conquest may be called a foreign usurpation, so usurpation is a kind of domestic conquest, with this difference, that an usurper can never have right on his side, it being no usurpation, but where one is got into the possession of what another has right to. This, so far as it is usurpation, is a change only of persons, but not of the forms and rules of the government: for if the usurper extend his power beyond what of right belonged to the lawful princes, or governors of the commonwealth, it is tyranny added to usurpation.

Sect. 198. In all lawful governments, the designation of the persons, who are to bear rule, is as natural and necessary a part as the form of the government itself, and is that which had its establishment originally from the people; the anarchy being much alike, to have no form of government at all; or to agree, that it shall be monarchical, but to appoint no way to design the person that shall have the power, and be the monarch. Hence all commonwealths, with the form of government established, have rules also of appointing those who are to have any share in the public authority, and settled methods of conveying the right to them: for the anarchy is much alike, to have no form of government at all; or to agree that it shall be monarchical, but to appoint no way to know or design the person that shall have the power, and be the monarch. Whoever gets into the exercise of any part of the power, by other ways than what the laws of the community have prescribed, hath no right to be obeyed, though the form of the commonwealth be still preserved; since he is not the person the laws have appointed, and consequently not the person the people have consented to. Nor can such an usurper, or any deriving from him, ever have a title, till the people are both at liberty to consent, and have actually consented to allow, and confirm in him the power he hath till then usurped.

CHAPTER. XVIII.

OF TYRANNY.

Sect. 199. AS usurpation is the exercise of power, which another hath a right to; so tyranny is the exercise of power beyond right, which no body can have a right to. And this is making use of the power any one has in his hands, not for the good of those who are under it, but for his own private separate advantage. When the governor, however intitled, makes not the law, but his will, the rule; and his commands and actions are not directed to the preservation of the properties of his people, but the satisfaction of his own ambition, revenge, covetousness, or any other irregular passion.

Sect. 200. If one can doubt this to be truth, or reason, because it comes from the obscure hand of a subject, I hope the authority of a king will make it pass with him. King James the first, in his speech to the parliament, 1603, tells them thus,

> I will ever prefer the weal of the public, and of the whole commonwealth, in making of good laws and constitutions, to any particular and private ends of mine; thinking ever the wealth and weal of the commonwealth to be my greatest weal and worldly felicity; a point wherein a lawful king doth directly differ from a tyrant: for I do acknowledge, that the special and greatest point of difference that is between a rightful king and an usurping tyrant, is this, that whereas the proud and ambitious tyrant doth think his kingdom and people are only ordained for satisfaction of his desires and unreasonable appetites, the righteous and just king doth by the contrary acknowledge himself to be ordained for the procuring of the wealth and property of his people.

And again, in his speech to the parliament, 1609, he hath these words:

> The king binds himself by a double oath, to the observation of the fundamental laws of his kingdom; tacitly, as by being a king, and so bound to protect as well the people, as the laws of his kingdom; and expressly, by his oath at his coronation, so as every just king, in a settled kingdom, is bound to observe that paction made to his people, by his laws, in framing his government agreeable thereunto, according to that paction which God made with Noah after the deluge. Hereafter, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease while the earth remaineth. And therefore a king governing in a settled kingdom, leaves to be a king, and degenerates into a tyrant, as soon as he leaves off to rule according to his laws.

And a little after,

> Therefore all kings that are not tyrants, or perjured, will be glad to bound themselves within the limits of their laws; and they that persuade them the contrary, are vipers, and pests both against them and the commonwealth.

Thus that learned king, who well understood the notion of things, makes the difference betwixt a king and a tyrant to consist only in this, that one makes the laws the bounds of his power, and the good of the public, the end of his government; the other makes all give way to his own will and appetite.

Sect. 201. It is a mistake, to think this fault is proper only to monarchies; other forms of government are liable to it, as well as that: for wherever the power, that is put in any hands for the government of the people, and the preservation of their properties, is applied to other ends, and made use of to impoverish, harass, or subdue them to the arbitrary and irregular commands of those that have it; there it presently becomes tyranny, whether those that thus use it are one or many. Thus we read of the thirty tyrants at Athens, as well as one at Syracuse; and the intolerable dominion of the Decemviri at Rome was nothing better.

Sect. 202. Where-ever law ends, tyranny begins, if the law be transgressed to another's harm; and whosoever in authority exceeds the power given him by the law, and makes use of the force he has under his command, to compass that upon the subject, which the law allows not, ceases in that to be a magistrate; and, acting without authority, may be opposed, as any other man, who by force invades the right of another. This is acknowledged in subordinate magistrates. He that hath authority to seize my person in the street, may be opposed as a thief and a robber, if he endeavours to break into my house to execute a writ, notwithstanding that I know he has such a warrant, and such a legal authority, as will impower him to arrest me abroad. And why this should not hold in the highest, as well as in the most inferior magistrate, I would gladly be informed. Is it reasonable, that the eldest brother, because he has the greatest part of his father's estate, should thereby have a right to take away any of his younger brothers portions? or that a rich man, who possessed a whole country, should from thence have a right to seize, when he pleased, the cottage and garden of his poor neighbour? The being rightfully possessed of great power and riches, exceedingly beyond the greatest part of the sons of Adam, is so far from being an excuse, much less a reason, for rapine and oppression, which the endamaging another without authority is, that it is a great aggravation of it: for the exceeding the bounds of authority is no more a right in a great, than in a petty officer; no more justifiable in a king than a constable; but is so much the worse in him, in that he has more trust put in him, has already a much greater share than the rest of his brethren, and is supposed, from the advantages of his education, employment, and counsellors, to be more knowing in the measures of right and wrong.

Sect. 203. May the commands then of a prince be opposed? may he be resisted as often as any one shall find himself aggrieved, and but imagine he has not right done him? This will unhinge and overturn all polities, and, instead of government and order, leave nothing but anarchy and confusion.

Sect. 204. To this I answer, that force is to be opposed to nothing, but to unjust and unlawful force; whoever makes any opposition in any other case, draws on himself a just condemnation both from God and man; and so no such danger or confusion will follow, as is often suggested: for,

Sect. 205. First, As, in some countries, the person of the prince by the law is sacred; and so, whatever he commands or does, his person is still free from all question or violence, not liable to force, or any judicial censure or condemnation. But yet opposition may be made to the illegal acts of any inferior officer, or other commissioned by him; unless he will, by actually putting himself into a state of war with his people, dissolve the government, and leave them to that defence which belongs to every one in the state of nature: for of such things who can tell what the end will be? and a neighbour kingdom has shewed the world an odd example. In all other cases the sacredness of the person exempts him from all inconveniencies, whereby he is secure, whilst the government stands, from all violence and harm whatsoever; than which there cannot be a wiser constitution: for the harm he can do in his own person not being likely to happen often, nor to extend itself far; nor being able by his single strength to subvert the laws, nor oppress the body of the people, should any prince have so much weakness, and ill nature as to be willing to do it, the inconveniency of some particular mischiefs, that may happen sometimes, when a heady prince comes to the throne, are well recompensed by the peace of the public, and security of the government, in the person of the chief magistrate, thus set out of the reach of danger: it being safer for the body, that some few private men should be sometimes in danger to suffer, than that the head of the republic should be easily, and upon slight occasions, exposed.

Sect. 206. Secondly, But this privilege, belonging only to the king's person, hinders not, but they may be questioned, opposed, and resisted, who use unjust force, though they pretend a commission from him, which the law authorizes not; as is plain in the case of him that has the king's writ to arrest a man, which is a full commission from the king; and yet he that has it cannot break open a man's house to do it, nor execute this command of the king upon certain days, nor in certain places, though this commission have no such exception in it; but they are the limitations of the law, which if any one transgress, the king's commission excuses him not: for the king's authority being given him only by the law, he cannot impower any one to act against the law, or justify him, by his commission, in so doing; the commission, or command of any magistrate, where he has no authority, being as void and insignificant, as that of any private man; the difference between the one and the other, being that the magistrate has some authority so far, and to such ends, and the private man has none at all: for it is not the commission, but the authority, that gives the right of acting; and against the laws there can be no authority. But, notwithstanding such resistance, the king's person and authority are still both secured, and so no danger to governor or government.

Sect. 207. Thirdly, Supposing a government wherein the person of the chief magistrate is not thus sacred; yet this doctrine of the lawfulness of resisting all unlawful exercises of his power, will not upon every slight occasion indanger him, or imbroil the government: for where the injured party may be relieved, and his damages repaired by appeal to the law, there can be no pretence for force, which is only to be used where a man is intercepted from appealing to the law: for nothing is to be accounted hostile force, but where it leaves not the remedy of such an appeal; and it is such force alone, that puts him that uses it into a state of war, and makes it lawful to resist him. A man with a sword in his hand demands my purse in the high-way, when perhaps I have not twelve pence in my pocket: this man I may lawfully kill. To another I deliver 100 pounds to hold only whilst I alight, which he refuses to restore me, when I am got up again, but draws his sword to defend the possession of it by force, if I endeavour to retake it. The mischief this man does me is a hundred, or possibly a thousand times more than the other perhaps intended me (whom I killed before he really did me any); and yet I might lawfully kill the one, and cannot so much as hurt the other lawfully. The reason whereof is plain; because the one using force, which threatened my life, I could not have time to appeal to the law to secure it: and when it was gone, it was too late to appeal. The law could not restore life to my dead carcass: the loss was irreparable; which to prevent, the law of nature gave me a right to destroy him, who had put himself into a state of war with me, and threatened my destruction. But in the other case, my life not being in danger, I may have the benefit of appealing to the law, and have reparation for my 100 pounds that way.

Sect. 208. Fourthly, But if the unlawful acts done by the magistrate be maintained (by the power he has got), and the remedy which is due by law, be by the same power obstructed; yet the right of resisting, even in such manifest acts of tyranny, will not suddenly, or on slight occasions, disturb the government: for if it reach no farther than some private men's cases, though they have a right to defend themselves, and to recover by force what by unlawful force is taken from them; yet the right to do so will not easily engage them in a contest, wherein they are sure to perish; it being as impossible for one, or a few oppressed men to disturb the government, where the body of the people do not think themselves concerned in it, as for a raving mad-man, or heady malcontent to overturn a well settled state; the people being as little apt to follow the one, as the other.

Sect. 209. But if either these illegal acts have extended to the majority of the people; or if the mischief and oppression has lighted only on some few, but in such cases, as the precedent, and consequences seem to threaten all; and they are persuaded in their consciences, that their laws, and with them their estates, liberties, and lives are in danger, and perhaps their religion too; how they will be hindered from resisting illegal force, used against them, I cannot tell. This is an inconvenience, I confess, that attends all governments whatsoever, when the governors have brought it to this pass, to be generally suspected of their people; the most dangerous state which they can possibly put themselves in, wherein they are the less to be pitied, because it is so easy to be avoided; it being as impossible for a governor, if he really means the good of his people, and the preservation of them, and their laws together, not to make them see and feel it, as it is for the father of a family, not to let his children see he loves, and takes care of them.

Sect. 210. But if all the world shall observe pretences of one kind, and actions of another; arts used to elude the law, and the trust of prerogative (which is an arbitrary power in some things left in the prince's hand to do good, not harm to the people) employed contrary to the end for which it was given: if the people shall find the ministers and subordinate magistrates chosen suitable to such ends, and favoured, or laid by, proportionably as they promote or oppose them: if they see several experiments made of arbitrary power, and that religion underhand favoured, (tho' publicly proclaimed against) which is readiest to introduce it; and the operators in it supported, as much as may be; and when that cannot be done, yet approved still, and liked the better: if a long train of actions shew the councils all tending that way; how can a man any more hinder himself from being persuaded in his own mind, which way things are going; or from casting about how to save himself, than he could from believing the captain of the ship he was in, was carrying him, and the rest of the company, to Algiers, when he found him always steering that course, though cross winds, leaks in his ship, and want of men and provisions did often force him to turn his course another way for some time, which he steadily returned to again, as soon as the wind, weather, and other circumstances would let him?

CHAPTER. XIX.

OF THE DISSOLUTION OF GOVERNMENT.

Sect. 211. HE that will with any clearness speak of the dissolution of government, ought in the first place to distinguish between the dissolution of the society and the dissolution of the government. That which makes the community, and brings men out of the loose state of nature, into one politic society, is the agreement which every one has with the rest to incorporate, and act as one body, and so be one distinct commonwealth. The usual, and almost only way whereby this union is dissolved, is the inroad of foreign force making a conquest upon them: for in that case, (not being able to maintain and support themselves, as one intire and independent body) the union belonging to that body which consisted therein, must necessarily cease, and so every one return to the state he was in before, with a liberty to shift for himself, and provide for his own safety, as he thinks fit, in some other society. Whenever the society is dissolved, it is certain the government of that society cannot remain. Thus conquerors swords often cut up governments by the roots, and mangle societies to pieces, separating the subdued or scattered multitude from the protection of, and dependence on, that society which ought to have preserved them from violence. The world is too well instructed in, and too forward to allow of, this way of dissolving of governments, to need any more to be said of it; and there wants not much argument to prove, that where the society is dissolved, the government cannot remain; that being as impossible, as for the frame of an house to subsist when the materials of it are scattered and dissipated by a whirl-wind, or jumbled into a confused heap by an earthquake.

Sect. 212. Besides this over-turning from without, governments are dissolved from within.

First, When the legislative is altered. Civil society being a state of peace, amongst those who are of it, from whom the state of war is excluded by the umpirage, which they have provided in their legislative, for the ending all differences that may arise amongst any of them, it is in their legislative, that the members of a commonwealth are united, and combined together into one coherent living body. This is the soul that gives form, life, and unity, to the commonwealth: from hence the several members have their mutual influence, sympathy, and connexion: and therefore, when the legislative is broken, or dissolved, dissolution and death follows: for the essence and union of the society consisting in having one will, the legislative, when once established by the majority, has the declaring, and as it were keeping of that will. The constitution of the legislative is the first and fundamental act of society, whereby provision is made for the continuation of their union, under the direction of persons, and bonds of laws, made by persons authorized thereunto, by the consent and appointment of the people, without which no one man, or number of men, amongst them, can have authority of making laws that shall be binding to the rest. When any one, or more, shall take upon them to make laws, whom the people have not appointed so to do, they make laws without authority, which the people are not therefore bound to obey; by which means they come again to be out of subjection, and may constitute to themselves a new legislative, as they think best, being in full liberty to resist the force of those, who without authority would impose any thing upon them. Every one is at the disposure of his own will, when those who had, by the delegation of the society, the declaring of the public will, are excluded from it, and others usurp the place, who have no such authority or delegation.

Sect. 213. This being usually brought about by such in the commonwealth who misuse the power they have; it is hard to consider it aright, and know at whose door to lay it, without knowing the form of government in which it happens. Let us suppose then the legislative placed in the concurrence of three distinct persons.

(1). A single hereditary person, having the constant, supreme, executive power, and with it the power of convoking and dissolving the other two within certain periods of time.

(3). An assembly of representatives chosen, pro tempore, by the people. Such a form of government supposed, it is evident,

Sect. 214. First, That when such a single person, or prince, sets up his own arbitrary will in place of the laws, which are the will of the society, declared by the legislative, then the legislative is changed: for that being in effect the legislative, whose rules and laws are put in execution, and required to be obeyed; when other laws are set up, and other rules pretended, and inforced, than what the legislative, constituted by the society, have enacted, it is plain that the legislative is changed. Whoever introduces new laws, not being thereunto authorized by the fundamental appointment of the society, or subverts the old, disowns and overturns the power by which they were made, and so sets up a new legislative.

Sect. 215. Secondly, When the prince hinders the legislative from assembling in its due time, or from acting freely, pursuant to those ends for which it was constituted, the legislative is altered: for it is not a certain number of men, no, nor their meeting, unless they have also freedom of debating, and leisure of perfecting, what is for the good of the society, wherein the legislative consists: when these are taken away or altered, so as to deprive the society of the due exercise of their power, the legislative is truly altered; for it is not names that constitute governments, but the use and exercise of those powers that were intended to accompany them; so that he, who takes away the freedom, or hinders the acting of the legislative in its due seasons, in effect takes away the legislative, and puts an end to the government.

Sect. 216. Thirdly, When, by the arbitrary power of the prince, the electors, or ways of election, are altered, without the consent, and contrary to the common interest of the people, there also the legislative is altered: for, if others than those whom the society hath authorized thereunto, do chuse, or in another way than what the society hath prescribed, those chosen are not the legislative appointed by the people.

Sect. 217. Fourthly, The delivery also of the people into the subjection of a foreign power, either by the prince, or by the legislative, is certainly a change of the legislative, and so a dissolution of the government: for the end why people entered into society being to be preserved one intire, free, independent society, to be governed by its own laws; this is lost, whenever they are given up into the power of another.

Sect. 218. Why, in such a constitution as this, the dissolution of the government in these cases is to be imputed to the prince, is evident; because he, having the force, treasure and offices of the state to employ, and often persuading himself, or being flattered by others, that as supreme magistrate he is uncapable of controul; he alone is in a condition to make great advances toward such changes, under pretence of lawful authority, and has it in his hands to terrify or suppress opposers, as factious, seditious, and enemies to the government: whereas no other part of the legislative, or people, is capable by themselves to attempt any alteration of the legislative, without open and visible rebellion, apt enough to be taken notice of, which, when it prevails, produces effects very little different from foreign conquest. Besides, the prince in such a form of government, having the power of dissolving the other parts of the legislative, and thereby rendering them private persons, they can never in opposition to him, or without his concurrence, alter the legislative by a law, his consent being necessary to give any of their decrees that sanction. But yet, so far as the other parts of the legislative any way contribute to any attempt upon the government, and do either promote, or not, what lies in them, hinder such designs, they are guilty, and partake in this, which is certainly the greatest crime which men can partake of one towards another.

Sec. 219.There is one way more whereby such a government may be dissolved, and that is: When he who has the supreme executive power, neglects and abandons that charge, so that the laws already made can no longer be put in execution. This is demonstratively to reduce all to anarchy, and so effectually to dissolve the government: for laws not being made for themselves, but to be, by their execution, the bonds of the society, to keep every part of the body politic in its due place and function; when that totally ceases, the government visibly ceases, and the people become a confused multitude, without order or connexion. Where there is no longer the administration of justice, for the securing of men's rights, nor any remaining power within the community to direct the force, or provide for the necessities of the public, there certainly is no government left. Where the laws cannot be executed, it is all one as if there were no laws; and a government without laws is, I suppose, a mystery in politics, unconceivable to human capacity, and inconsistent with human society.

Sect. 220. In these and the like cases, when the government is dissolved, the people are at liberty to provide for themselves, by erecting a new legislative, differing from the other, by the change of persons, or form, or both, as they shall find it most for their safety and good: for the society can never, by the fault of another, lose the native and original right it has to preserve itself, which can only be done by a settled legislative, and a fair and impartial execution of the laws made by it. But the state of mankind is not so miserable that they are not capable of using this remedy, till it be too late to look for any. To tell people they may provide for themselves, by erecting a new legislative, when by oppression, artifice, or being delivered over to a foreign power, their old one is gone, is only to tell them, they may expect relief when it is too late, and the evil is past cure. This is in effect no more than to bid them first be slaves, and then to take care of their liberty; and when their chains are on, tell them, they may act like freemen. This, if barely so, is rather mockery than relief; and men can never be secure from tyranny, if there be no means to escape it till they are perfectly under it: and therefore it is, that they have not only a right to get out of it, but to prevent it.

Sect. 221. There is therefore, secondly, another way whereby governments are dissolved, and that is, when the legislative, or the prince, either of them, act contrary to their trust.

First, The legislative acts against the trust reposed in them, when they endeavour to invade the property of the subject, and to make themselves, or any part of the community, masters, or arbitrary disposers of the lives, liberties, or fortunes of the people.

Sect. 222. The reason why men enter into society, is the preservation of their property; and the end why they chuse and authorize a legislative, is, that there may be laws made, and rules set, as guards and fences to the properties of all the members of the society, to limit the power, and moderate the dominion, of every part and member of the society: for since it can never be supposed to be the will of the society, that the legislative should have a power to destroy that which every one designs to secure, by entering into society, and for which the people submitted themselves to legislators of their own making; whenever the legislators endeavour to take away, and destroy the property of the people, or to reduce them to slavery under arbitrary power, they put themselves into a state of war with the people, who are thereupon absolved from any farther obedience, and are left to the common refuge, which God hath provided for all men, against force and violence. Whensoever therefore the legislative shall transgress this fundamental rule of society; and either by ambition, fear, folly or corruption, endeavour to grasp themselves, or put into the hands of any other, an absolute power over the lives, liberties, and estates of the people; by this breach of trust they forfeit the power the people had put into their hands for quite contrary ends, and it devolves to the people, who have a right to resume their original liberty, and, by the establishment of a new legislative, (such as they shall think fit) provide for their own safety and security, which is the end for which they are in society. What I have said here, concerning the legislative in general, holds true also concerning the supreme executor, who having a double trust put in him, both to have a part in the legislative, and the supreme execution of the law, acts against both, when he goes about to set up his own arbitrary will as the law of the society. He acts also contrary to his trust, when he either employs the force, treasure, and offices of the society, to corrupt the representatives, and gain them to his purposes; or openly preengages the electors, and prescribes to their choice, such, whom he has, by sollicitations, threats, promises, or otherwise, won to his designs; and employs them to bring in such, who have promised before-hand what to vote, and what to enact. Thus to regulate candidates and electors, and new-model the ways of election, what is it but to cut up the government by the roots, and poison the very fountain of public security? for the people having reserved to themselves the choice of their representatives, as the fence to their properties, could do it for no other end, but that they might always be freely chosen, and so chosen, freely act, and advise, as the necessity of the commonwealth, and the public good should, upon examination, and mature debate, be judged to require. This, those who give their votes before they hear the debate, and have weighed the reasons on all sides, are not capable of doing. To prepare such an assembly as this, and endeavour to set up the declared abettors of his own will, for the true representatives of the people, and the law-makers of the society, is certainly as great a breach of trust, and as perfect a declaration of a design to subvert the government, as is possible to be met with. To which, if one shall add rewards and punishments visibly employed to the same end, and all the arts of perverted law made use of, to take off and destroy all that stand in the way of such a design, and will not comply and consent to betray the liberties of their country, it will be past doubt what is doing. What power they ought to have in the society, who thus employ it contrary to the trust went along with it in its first institution, is easy to determine; and one cannot but see, that he, who has once attempted any such thing as this, cannot any longer be trusted.

Sect. 223. To this perhaps it will be said, that the people being ignorant, and always discontented, to lay the foundation of government in the unsteady opinion and uncertain humour of the people, is to expose it to certain ruin; and no government will be able long to subsist, if the people may set up a new legislative, whenever they take offence at the old one. To this I answer, Quite the contrary. People are not so easily got out of their old forms, as some are apt to suggest. They are hardly to be prevailed with to amend the acknowledged faults in the frame they have been accustomed to. And if there be any original defects, or adventitious ones introduced by time, or corruption; it is not an easy thing to get them changed, even when all the world sees there is an opportunity for it. This slowness and aversion in the people to quit their old constitutions, has, in the many revolutions which have been seen in this kingdom, in this and former ages, still kept us to, or, after some interval of fruitless attempts, still brought us back again to our old legislative of king, lords and commons: and whatever provocations have made the crown be taken from some of our princes heads, they never carried the people so far as to place it in another line.

Sect. 224. But it will be said, this hypothesis lays a ferment for frequent rebellion. To which I answer, First, No more than any other hypothesis: for when the people are made miserable, and find themselves exposed to the ill usage of arbitrary power, cry up their governors, as much as you will, for sons of Jupiter; let them be sacred and divine, descended, or authorized from heaven; give them out for whom or what you please, the same will happen. The people generally ill treated, and contrary to right, will be ready upon any occasion to ease themselves of a burden that sits heavy upon them. They will wish, and seek for the opportunity, which in the change, weakness and accidents of human affairs, seldom delays long to offer itself. He must have lived but a little while in the world, who has not seen examples of this in his time; and he must have read very little, who cannot produce examples of it in all sorts of governments in the world.

Sect. 225. Secondly, I answer, such revolutions happen not upon every little mismanagement in public affairs. Great mistakes in the ruling part, many wrong and inconvenient laws, and all the slips of human frailty, will be born by the people without mutiny or murmur. But if a long train of abuses, prevarications and artifices, all tending the same way, make the design visible to the people, and they cannot but feel what they lie under, and see whither they are going; it is not to be wondered, that they should then rouze themselves, and endeavour to put the rule into such hands which may secure to them the ends for which government was at first erected; and without which, ancient names, and specious forms, are so far from being better, that they are much worse, than the state of nature, or pure anarchy; the inconveniencies being all as great and as near, but the remedy farther off and more difficult.

Sect. 226. Thirdly, I answer, that this doctrine of a power in the people of providing for their safety a-new, by a new legislative, when their legislators have acted contrary to their trust, by invading their property, is the best fence against rebellion, and the probablest means to hinder it: for rebellion being an opposition, not to persons, but authority, which is founded only in the constitutions and laws of the government; those, whoever they be, who by force break through, and by force justify their violation of them, are truly and properly rebels: for when men, by entering into society and civil-government, have excluded force, and introduced laws for the preservation of property, peace, and unity amongst themselves, those who set up force again in opposition to the laws, do rebellare, that is, bring back again the state of war, and are properly rebels: which they who are in power, (by the pretence they have to authority, the temptation of force they have in their hands, and the flattery of those about them) being likeliest to do; the properest way to prevent the evil, is to shew them the danger and injustice of it, who are under the greatest temptation to run into it.

Sect. 227. In both the fore-mentioned cases, when either the legislative is changed, or the legislators act contrary to the end for which they were constituted; those who are guilty are guilty of rebellion: for if any one by force takes away the established legislative of any society, and the laws by them made, pursuant to their trust, he thereby takes away the umpirage, which every one had consented to, for a peaceable decision of all their controversies, and a bar to the state of war amongst them. They, who remove, or change the legislative, take away this decisive power, which no body can have, but by the appointment and consent of the people; and so destroying the authority which the people did, and no body else can set up, and introducing a power which the people hath not authorized, they actually introduce a state of war, which is that of force without authority: and thus, by removing the legislative established by the society, (in whose decisions the people acquiesced and united, as to that of their own will) they untie the knot, and expose the people a-new to the state of war, And if those, who by force take away the legislative, are rebels, the legislators themselves, as has been shewn, can be no less esteemed so; when they, who were set up for the protection, and preservation of the people, their liberties and properties, shall by force invade and endeavour to take them away; and so they putting themselves into a state of war with those who made them the protectors and guardians of their peace, are properly, and with the greatest aggravation, rebellantes, rebels.

Sect. 228. But if they, who say it lays a foundation for rebellion, mean that it may occasion civil wars, or intestine broils, to tell the people they are absolved from obedience when illegal attempts are made upon their liberties or properties, and may oppose the unlawful violence of those who were their magistrates, when they invade their properties contrary to the trust put in them; and that therefore this doctrine is not to be allowed, being so destructive to the peace of the world: they may as well say, upon the same ground, that honest men may not oppose robbers or pirates, because this may occasion disorder or bloodshed. If any mischief come in such cases, it is not to be charged upon him who defends his own right, but on him that invades his neighbours. If the innocent honest man must quietly quit all he has, for peace sake, to him who will lay violent hands upon it, I desire it may be considered, what a kind of peace there will be in the world, which consists only in violence and rapine; and which is to be maintained only for the benefit of robbers and oppressors. Who would not think it an admirable peace betwix the mighty and the mean, when the lamb, without resistance, yielded his throat to be torn by the imperious wolf? Polyphemus's den gives us a perfect pattern of such a peace, and such a government, wherein Ulysses and his companions had nothing to do, but quietly to suffer themselves to be devoured. And no doubt Ulysses, who was a prudent man, preached up passive obedience, and exhorted them to a quiet submission, by representing to them of what concernment peace was to mankind; and by shewing the inconveniences might happen, if they should offer to resist Polyphemus, who had now the power over them.

Sect. 229. The end of government is the good of mankind; and which is best for mankind, that the people should be always exposed to the boundless will of tyranny, or that the rulers should be sometimes liable to be opposed, when they grow exorbitant in the use of their power, and employ it for the destruction, and not the preservation of the properties of their people?

Sect. 230. Nor let any one say, that mischief can arise from hence, as often as it shall please a busy head, or turbulent spirit, to desire the alteration of the government. It is true, such men may stir, whenever they please; but it will be only to their own just ruin and perdition: for till the mischief be grown general, and the ill designs of the rulers become visible, or their attempts sensible to the greater part, the people, who are more disposed to suffer than right themselves by resistance, are not apt to stir. The examples of particular injustice, or oppression of here and there an unfortunate man, moves them not. But if they universally have a persuation, grounded upon manifest evidence, that designs are carrying on against their liberties, and the general course and tendency of things cannot but give them strong suspicions of the evil intention of their governors, who is to be blamed for it? Who can help it, if they, who might avoid it, bring themselves into this suspicion? Are the people to be blamed, if they have the sense of rational creatures, and can think of things no otherwise than as they find and feel them? And is it not rather their fault, who put things into such a posture, that they would not have them thought to be as they are? I grant, that the pride, ambition, and turbulency of private men have sometimes caused great disorders in commonwealths, and factions have been fatal to states and kingdoms. But whether the mischief hath oftener begun in the peoples wantonness, and a desire to cast off the lawful authority of their rulers, or in the rulers insolence, and endeavours to get and exercise an arbitrary power over their people; whether oppression, or disobedience, gave the first rise to the disorder, I leave it to impartial history to determine. This I am sure, whoever, either ruler or subject, by force goes about to invade the rights of either prince or people, and lays the foundation for overturning the constitution and frame of any just government, is highly guilty of the greatest crime, I think, a man is capable of, being to answer for all those mischiefs of blood, rapine, and desolation, which the breaking to pieces of governments bring on a country. And he who does it, is justly to be esteemed the common enemy and pest of mankind, and is to be treated accordingly.

Sect. 231. That subjects or foreigners, attempting by force on the properties of any people, may be resisted with force, is agreed on all hands. But that magistrates, doing the same thing, may be resisted, hath of late been denied: as if those who had the greatest privileges and advantages by the law, had thereby a power to break those laws, by which alone they were set in a better place than their brethren: whereas their offence is thereby the greater, both as being ungrateful for the greater share they have by the law, and breaking also that trust, which is put into their hands by their brethren.

Sect. 232. Whosoever uses force without right, as every one does in society, who does it without law, puts himself into a state of war with those against whom he so uses it; and in that state all former ties are cancelled, all other rights cease, and every one has a right to defend himself, and to resist the aggressor. This is so evident, that Barclay himself, that great assertor of the power and sacredness of kings, is forced to confess, That it is lawful for the people, in some cases, to resist their king; and that too in a chapter, wherein he pretends to shew, that the divine law shuts up the people from all manner of rebellion. Whereby it is evident, even by his own doctrine, that, since they may in some cases resist, all resisting of princes is not rebellion. His words are these. Quod siquis dicat, Ergone populus tyrannicae crudelitati & furori jugulum semper praebebit? Ergone multitude civitates suas fame, ferro, & flamma vastari, seque, conjuges, & liberos fortunae ludibrio & tyranni libidini exponi, inque omnia vitae pericula omnesque miserias & molestias a rege deduci patientur? Num illis quod omni animantium generi est a natura tributum, denegari debet, ut sc. vim vi repellant, seseq; ab injuria, tueantur? Huic breviter responsum sit, Populo universo negari defensionem, quae juris naturalis est, neque ultionem quae praeter naturam est adversus regem concedi debere. Quapropter si rex non in singulares tantum personas aliquot privatum odium exerceat, sed corpus etiam reipublicae, cujus ipse caput est, i.e. totum populum, vel insignem aliquam ejus partem immani & intoleranda saevitia seu tyrannide divexet; populo, quidem hoc casu resistendi ac tuendi se ab injuria potestas competit, sed tuendi se tantum, non enim in principem invadendi: & restituendae injuriae illatae, non recedendi a debita reverentia propter acceptam injuriam. Praesentem denique impetum propulsandi non vim praeteritam ulciscenti jus habet. Horum enim alterum a natura est, ut vitam scilicet corpusque tueamur. Alterum vero contra naturam, ut inferior de superiori supplicium sumat. Quod itaque populus malum, antequam factum sit, impedire potest, ne fiat, id postquam factum est, in regem authorem sceleris vindicare non potest: populus igitur hoc amplius quam privatus quispiam habet: quod huic, vel ipsis adversariis judicibus, excepto Buchanano, nullum nisi in patientia remedium superest. Cum ille si intolerabilis tyrannus est (modicum enim ferre omnino debet) resistere cum reverentia possit, Barclay contra Monarchom. 1. iii. c. 8.

In English thus:

Sect. 233. But if any one should ask, Must the people then always lay themselves open to the cruelty and rage of tyranny? Must they see their cities pillaged, and laid in ashes, their wives and children exposed to the tyrant's lust and fury, and themselves and families reduced by their king to ruin, and all the miseries of want and oppression, and yet sit still? Must men alone be debarred the common privilege of opposing force with force, which nature allows so freely to all other creatures for their preservation from injury? I answer: Self-defence is a part of the law of nature; nor can it be denied the community, even against the king himself: but to revenge themselves upon him, must by no means be allowed them; it being not agreeable to that law. Wherefore if the king shall shew an hatred, not only to some particular persons, but sets himself against the body of the commonwealth, whereof he is the head, and shall, with intolerable ill usage, cruelly tyrannize over the whole, or a considerable part of the people, in this case the people have a right to resist and defend themselves from injury: but it must be with this caution, that they only defend themselves, but do not attack their prince: they may repair the damages received, but must not for any provocation exceed the bounds of due reverence and respect. They may repulse the present attempt, but must not revenge past violences: for it is natural for us to defend life and limb, but that an inferior should punish a superior, is against nature. The mischief which is designed them, the people may prevent before it be done; but when it is done, they must not revenge it on the king, though author of the villany. This therefore is the privilege of the people in general, above what any private person hath; that particular men are allowed by our adversaries themselves (Buchanan only excepted) to have no other remedy but patience; but the body of the people may with respect resist intolerable tyranny; for when it is but moderate, they ought to endure it.

Sect. 234. Thus far that great advocate of monarchical power allows of resistance.

Sect. 235. It is true, he has annexed two limitations to it, to no purpose:

First, He says, it must be with reverence.

Secondly, It must be without retribution, or punishment; and the reason he gives is, because an inferior cannot punish a superior. First, How to resist force without striking again, or how to strike with reverence, will need some skill to make intelligible. He that shall oppose an assault only with a shield to receive the blows, or in any more respectful posture, without a sword in his hand, to abate the confidence and force of the assailant, will quickly be at an end of his resistance, and will find such a defence serve only to draw on himself the worse usage. This is as ridiculous a way of resisting, as juvenal thought it of fighting; ubi tu pulsas, ego vapulo tantum. And the success of the combat will be unavoidably the same he there describes it:

——-Libertas pauperis haec est:
Pulsatus rogat, et pugnis concisus, adorat,
Ut liceat paucis cum dentibus inde reverti.

This will always be the event of such an imaginary resistance, where men may not strike again. He therefore who may resist, must be allowed to strike. And then let our author, or any body else, join a knock on the head, or a cut on the face, with as much reverence and respect as he thinks fit. He that can reconcile blows and reverence, may, for aught I know, desire for his pains, a civil, respectful cudgeling where-ever he can meet with it.

Secondly, As to his second, An inferior cannot punish a superior; that is true, generally speaking, whilst he is his superior. But to resist force with force, being the state of war that levels the parties, cancels all former relation of reverence, respect, and superiority: and then the odds that remains, is, that he, who opposes the unjust agressor, has this superiority over him, that he has a right, when he prevails, to punish the offender, both for the breach of the peace, and all the evils that followed upon it. Barclay therefore, in another place, more coherently to himself, denies it to be lawful to resist a king in any case. But he there assigns two cases, whereby a king may un-king himself. His words are,

Quid ergo, nulline casus incidere possunt quibus populo sese erigere atque in regem impotentius dominantem arma capere & invadere jure suo suaque authoritate liceat? Nulli certe quamdiu rex manet. Semper enim ex divinis id obstat, Regem honorificato; & qui potestati resistit, Dei ordinationi resisit: non alias igitur in eum populo potestas est quam si id committat propter quod ipso jure rex esse desinat. Tunc enim se ipse principatu exuit atque in privatis constituit liber: hoc modo populus & superior efficitur, reverso ad eum sc. jure illo quod ante regem inauguratum in interregno habuit. At sunt paucorum generum commissa ejusmodi quae hunc effectum pariunt. At ego cum plurima animo perlustrem, duo tantum invenio, duos, inquam, casus quibus rex ipso facto ex rege non regem se facit & omni honore & dignitate regali atque in subditos potestate destituit; quorum etiam meminit Winzerus. Horum unus est, Si regnum disperdat, quemadmodum de Nerone fertur, quod is nempe senatum populumque Romanum, atque adeo urbem ipsam ferro flammaque vastare, ac novas sibi sedes quaerere decrevisset. Et de Caligula, quod palam denunciarit se neque civem neque principem senatui amplius fore, inque animo habuerit interempto utriusque ordinis electissimo quoque Alexandriam commigrare, ac ut populum uno ictu interimeret, unam ei cervicem optavit. Talia cum rex aliquis meditator & molitur serio, omnem regnandi curam & animum ilico abjicit, ac proinde imperium in subditos amittit, ut dominus servi pro derelicto habiti dominium.

Sect. 236. Alter casus est, Si rex in alicujus clientelam se contulit, ac regnum quod liberum a majoribus & populo traditum accepit, alienae ditioni mancipavit. Nam tunc quamvis forte non ea mente id agit populo plane ut incommodet: tamen quia quod praecipuum est regiae dignitatis amifit, ut summus scilicet in regno secundum Deum sit, & solo Deo inferior, atque populum etiam totum ignorantem vel invitum, cujus libertatem sartam & tectam conservare debuit, in alterius gentis ditionem & potestatem dedidit; hac velut quadam regni ab alienatione effecit, ut nec quod ipse in regno imperium habuit retineat, nec in eum cui collatum voluit, juris quicquam transferat; atque ita eo facto liberum jam & suae potestatis populum relinquit, cujus rei exemplum unum annales Scotici suppeditant. Barclay contra Monarchom. 1. iii. c. 16.

Which in English runs thus:

Sect. 237. What then, can there no case happen wherein the people may of right, and by their own authority, help themselves, take arms, and set upon their king, imperiously domineering over them? None at all, whilst he remains a king. Honour the king, and he that resists the power, resists the ordinance of God; are divine oracles that will never permit it, The people therefore can never come by a power over him, unless he does something that makes him cease to be a king: for then he divests himself of his crown and dignity, and returns to the state of a private man, and the people become free and superior, the power which they had in the interregnum, before they crowned him king, devolving to them again. But there are but few miscarriages which bring the matter to this state. After considering it well on all sides, I can find but two. Two cases there are, I say, whereby a king, ipso facto, becomes no king, and loses all power and regal authority over his people; which are also taken notice of by Winzerus.

The first is, If he endeavour to overturn the government, that is, if he have a purpose and design to ruin the kingdom and commonwealth, as it is recorded of Nero, that he resolved to cut off the senate and people of Rome, lay the city waste with fire and sword, and then remove to some other place. And of Caligula, that he openly declared, that he would be no longer a head to the people or senate, and that he had it in his thoughts to cut off the worthiest men of both ranks, and then retire to Alexandria: and he wisht that the people had but one neck, that he might dispatch them all at a blow, Such designs as these, when any king harbours in his thoughts, and seriously promotes, he immediately gives up all care and thought of the commonwealth; and consequently forfeits the power of governing his subjects, as a master does the dominion over his slaves whom he hath abandoned.

Sect. 238. The other case is, When a king makes himself the dependent of another, and subjects his kingdom which his ancestors left him, and the people put free into his hands, to the dominion of another: for however perhaps it may not be his intention to prejudice the people; yet because he has hereby lost the principal part of regal dignity, viz. to be next and immediately under God, supreme in his kingdom; and also because he betrayed or forced his people, whose liberty he ought to have carefully preserved, into the power and dominion of a foreign nation. By this, as it were, alienation of his kingdom, he himself loses the power he had in it before, without transferring any the least right to those on whom he would have bestowed it; and so by this act sets the people free, and leaves them at their own disposal. One example of this is to be found in the Scotch Annals.

Sect. 239. In these cases Barclay, the great champion of absolute monarchy, is forced to allow, that a king may be resisted, and ceases to be a king. That is, in short, not to multiply cases, in whatsoever he has no authority, there he is no king, and may be resisted: for wheresoever the authority ceases, the king ceases too, and becomes like other men who have no authority. And these two cases he instances in, differ little from those above mentioned, to be destructive to governments, only that he has omitted the principle from which his doctrine flows: and that is, the breach of trust, in not preserving the form of government agreed on, and in not intending the end of government itself, which is the public good and preservation of property. When a king has dethroned himself, and put himself in a state of war with his people, what shall hinder them from prosecuting him who is no king, as they would any other man, who has put himself into a state of war with them, Barclay, and those of his opinion, would do well to tell us. This farther I desire may be taken notice of out of Barclay, that he says, The mischief that is designed them, the people may prevent before it be done: whereby he allows resistance when tyranny is but in design. Such designs as these (says he) when any king harbours in his thoughts and seriously promotes, he immediately gives up all care and thought of the commonwealth; so that, according to him, the neglect of the public good is to be taken as an evidence of such design, or at least for a sufficient cause of resistance. And the reason of all, he gives in these words, Because he betrayed or forced his people, whose liberty he ought carefully to have preserved. What he adds, into the power and dominion of a foreign nation, signifies nothing, the fault and forfeiture lying in the loss of their liberty, which he ought to have preserved, and not in any distinction of the persons to whose dominion they were subjected. The peoples right is equally invaded, and their liberty lost, whether they are made slaves to any of their own, or a foreign nation; and in this lies the injury, and against this only have they the right of defence. And there are instances to be found in all countries, which shew, that it is not the change of nations in the persons of their governors, but the change of government, that gives the offence. Bilson, a bishop of our church, and a great stickler for the power and prerogative of princes, does, if I mistake not, in his treatise of Christian subjection, acknowledge, that princes may forfeit their power, and their title to the obedience of their subjects; and if there needed authority in a case where reason is so plain, I could send my reader to Bracton, Fortescue, and the author of the Mirrour, and others, writers that cannot be suspected to be ignorant of our government, or enemies to it. But I thought Hooker alone might be enough to satisfy those men, who relying on him for their ecclesiastical polity, are by a strange fate carried to deny those principles upon which he builds it. Whether they are herein made the tools of cunninger workmen, to pull down their own fabric, they were best look. This I am sure, their civil policy is so new, so dangerous, and so destructive to both rulers and people, that as former ages never could bear the broaching of it; so it may be hoped, those to come, redeemed from the impositions of these Egyptian under-task-masters, will abhor the memory of such servile flatterers, who, whilst it seemed to serve their turn, resolved all government into absolute tyranny, and would have all men born to, what their mean souls fitted them for, slavery.

Sect. 240. Here, it is like, the common question will be made, Who shall be judge, whether the prince or legislative act contrary to their trust? This, perhaps, ill-affected and factious men may spread amongst the people, when the prince only makes use of his due prerogative. To this I reply, The people shall be judge; for who shall be judge whether his trustee or deputy acts well, and according to the trust reposed in him, but he who deputes him, and must, by having deputed him, have still a power to discard him, when he fails in his trust? If this be reasonable in particular cases of private men, why should it be otherwise in that of the greatest moment, where the welfare of millions is concerned, and also where the evil, if not prevented, is greater, and the redress very difficult, dear, and dangerous?

Sect. 241. But farther, this question, (Who shall be judge?) cannot mean, that there is no judge at all: for where there is no judicature on earth, to decide controversies amongst men, God in heaven is judge. He alone, it is true, is judge of the right. But every man is judge for himself, as in all other cases, so in this, whether another hath put himself into a state of war with him, and whether he should appeal to the Supreme Judge, as Jeptha did.

Sect. 242. If a controversy arise betwixt a prince and some of the people, in a matter where the law is silent, or doubtful, and the thing be of great consequence, I should think the proper umpire, in such a case, should be the body of the people: for in cases where the prince hath a trust reposed in him, and is dispensed from the common ordinary rules of the law; there, if any men find themselves aggrieved, and think the prince acts contrary to, or beyond that trust, who so proper to judge as the body of the people, (who, at first, lodged that trust in him) how far they meant it should extend? But if the prince, or whoever they be in the administration, decline that way of determination, the appeal then lies no where but to heaven; force between either persons, who have no known superior on earth, or which permits no appeal to a judge on earth, being properly a state of war, wherein the appeal lies only to heaven; and in that state the injured party must judge for himself, when he will think fit to make use of that appeal, and put himself upon it.

Sect. 243. To conclude, The power that every individual gave the society, when he entered into it, can never revert to the individuals again, as long as the society lasts, but will always remain in the community; because without this there can be no community, no commonwealth, which is contrary to the original agreement: so also when the society hath placed the legislative in any assembly of men, to continue in them and their successors, with direction and authority for providing such successors, the legislative can never revert to the people whilst that government lasts; because having provided a legislative with power to continue for ever, they have given up their political power to the legislative, and cannot resume it. But if they have set limits to the duration of their legislative, and made this supreme power in any person, or assembly, only temporary; or else, when by the miscarriages of those in authority, it is forfeited; upon the forfeiture, or at the determination of the time set, it reverts to the society, and the people have a right to act as supreme, and continue the legislative in themselves; or erect a new form, or under the old form place it in new hands, as they think good.

Special rules, set forth in the General Terms of Use part of this license, apply to copying and distributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works to protect the PROJECT GUTENBERG-tm concept and trademark. Project Gutenberg is a registered trademark, and may not be used if you charge for the eBooks, unless you receive specific permission. If you do not charge anything for copies of this eBook, complying with the rules is very easy. You may use this eBook for nearly any purpose such as creation of derivative works, reports, performances and research. They may be modified and printed and given away--you may do practically ANYTHING with public domain eBooks. Redistribution is subject to the trademark license, especially commercial redistribution.

 START: FULL LICENSE ***

THE FULL PROJECT GUTENBERG LICENSE
PLEASE READ THIS BEFORE YOU DISTRIBUTE OR USE THIS WORK

To protect the Project Gutenberg-tm mission of promoting the free distribution of electronic works, by using or distributing this work (or any other work associated in any way with the phrase "Project Gutenberg"), you agree to comply with all the terms of the Full Project Gutenberg-tm License (available with this file or online at http://gutenberg.org/license).

Section 1. General Terms of Use and Redistributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works

1.A. By reading or using any part of this Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work, you indicate that you have read, understand, agree to and accept all the terms of this license and intellectual property (trademark/copyright) agreement. If you do not agree to abide by all the terms of this agreement, you must cease using and return or destroy all copies of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works in your possession. If you paid a fee for obtaining a copy of or access to a Project

Gutenberg-tm electronic work and you do not agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement, you may obtain a refund from the person or entity to whom you paid the fee as set forth in paragraph 1.E.8.

1.B. "Project Gutenberg" is a registered trademark. It may only be used on or associated in any way with an electronic work by people who agree to be bound by the terms of this agreement. There are a few things that you can do with most Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works even without complying with the full terms of this agreement. See paragraph 1.C below. There are a lot of things you can do with Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works if you follow the terms of this agreement and help preserve free future access to Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works. See paragraph 1.E below.

1.C. The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation ("the Foundation" or PGLAF), owns a compilation copyright in the collection of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works. Nearly all the individual works in the collection are in the public domain in the United States. If an individual work is in the public domain in the United States and you are located in the United States, we do not claim a right to prevent you from copying, distributing, performing, displaying or creating derivative works based on the work as long as all references to Project Gutenberg are removed. Of course, we hope that you will support the Project Gutenberg-tm mission of promoting free access to electronic works by freely sharing Project Gutenberg-tm works in compliance with the terms of this agreement for keeping the Project Gutenberg-tm name associated with the work. You can easily comply with the terms of this agreement by keeping this work in the same format with its attached full Project Gutenberg-tm License when you share it without charge with others.

1.D. The copyright laws of the place where you are located also govern what you can do with this work. Copyright laws in most countries are in a constant state of change. If you are outside the United States, check the laws of your country in addition to the terms of this agreement before downloading, copying, displaying, performing, distributing or creating derivative works based on this work or any other Project Gutenberg-tm work. The Foundation makes no representations concerning the copyright status of any work in any country outside the United States.

1.E. Unless you have removed all references to Project Gutenberg:

1.E.1. The following sentence, with active links to, or other immediate access to, the full Project Gutenberg-tm License must appear prominently whenever any copy of a Project Gutenberg-tm work (any work on which the phrase "Project Gutenberg" appears, or with which the phrase "Project Gutenberg" is associated) is accessed, displayed, performed, viewed, copied or distributed:

This eBook is for the use of anyone anywhere at no cost and with almost no restrictions whatsoever. You may copy it, give it away or re-use it under the terms of the Project Gutenberg License included with this eBook or online at www.gutenberg.org

1.E.2. If an individual Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work is derived from the public domain (does not contain a notice indicating that it is posted with permission of the copyright holder), the work can be copied and distributed to anyone in the United States without paying any fees or charges. If you are redistributing or providing access to a work with the phrase "Project Gutenberg" associated with or appearing on the work, you must comply either with the requirements of paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 or obtain permission for the use of the work and the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark as set forth in paragraphs 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.3. If an individual Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work is posted with the permission of the copyright holder, your use and distribution must comply with both paragraphs 1.E.1 through 1.E.7 and any additional terms imposed by the copyright holder. Additional terms will be linked to the Project Gutenberg-tm License for all works posted with the permission of the copyright holder found at the beginning of this work.

1.E.4. Do not unlink or detach or remove the full Project Gutenberg-tm License terms from this work, or any files containing a part of this work or any other work associated with Project Gutenberg-tm.

1.E.5. Do not copy, display, perform, distribute or redistribute this electronic work, or any part of this electronic work, without prominently displaying the sentence set forth in paragraph 1.E.1 with active links or immediate access to the full terms of the Project Gutenberg-tm License.

1.E.6. You may convert to and distribute this work in any binary, compressed, marked up, nonproprietary or proprietary form, including any word processing or hypertext form. However, if you provide access to or distribute copies of a Project Gutenberg-tm work in a format other than "Plain Vanilla ASCII" or other format used in the official version posted on the official Project Gutenberg-tm web site (www.gutenberg.org), you must, at no additional cost, fee or expense to the user, provide a copy, a means of exporting a copy, or a means of obtaining a copy upon request, of the work in its original "Plain Vanilla ASCII" or other form. Any alternate format must include the full Project Gutenberg-tm License as specified in paragraph 1.E.1.

1.E.7. Do not charge a fee for access to, viewing, displaying, performing, copying or distributing any Project Gutenberg-tm works unless you comply with paragraph 1.E.8 or 1.E.9.

1.E.8. You may charge a reasonable fee for copies of or providing access to or distributing Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works provided that

- You pay a royalty fee of 20% of the gross profits you derive from the use of Project Gutenberg-tm works calculated using the method you already use to calculate your applicable taxes. The fee is owed to the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark, but he has agreed to donate royalties under this paragraph to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation. Royalty payments must be paid within 60 days following each date on which you prepare (or are legally required to prepare) your periodic tax returns. Royalty payments should be clearly marked as such and sent to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation at the address specified in Section 4, "Information about donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation."

- You provide a full refund of any money paid by a user who notifies you in writing (or by e-mail) within 30 days of receipt that s/he does not agree to the terms of the full Project Gutenberg-tm License. You must require such a user to return or destroy all copies of the works possessed in a physical medium and discontinue all use of and all access to other copies of Project Gutenberg-tm works.

- You provide, in accordance with paragraph 1.F.3, a full refund of any money paid for a work or a replacement copy, if a defect in the electronic work is discovered and reported to you within 90 days of receipt of the work.

- You comply with all other terms of this agreement for free distribution of Project Gutenberg-tm works.

1.E.9. If you wish to charge a fee or distribute a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work or group of works on different terms than are set forth in this agreement, you must obtain permission in writing from both the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and Michael Hart, the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark. Contact the Foundation as set forth in Section 3 below.

1.F.

1.F.1. Project Gutenberg volunteers and employees expend considerable effort to identify, do copyright research on, transcribe and proofread public domain works in creating the Project Gutenberg-tm collection. Despite these efforts, Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works, and the medium on which they may be stored, may contain "Defects," such as, but not limited to, incomplete, inaccurate or corrupt data, transcription errors, a copyright or other intellectual property infringement, a defective or damaged disk or other medium, a computer virus, or computer codes that damage or cannot be read by your equipment.

1.F.2. LIMITED WARRANTY, DISCLAIMER OF DAMAGES - Except for the "Right of Replacement or Refund" described in paragraph 1.F.3, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, the owner of the Project Gutenberg-tm trademark, and any other party distributing a Project Gutenberg-tm electronic work under this agreement, disclaim all liability to you for damages, costs and expenses, including legal fees. YOU AGREE THAT YOU HAVE NO REMEDIES FOR NEGLIGENCE, STRICT LIABILITY, BREACH OF WARRANTY OR BREACH OF CONTRACT EXCEPT THOSE PROVIDED IN PARAGRAPH F3. YOU AGREE THAT THE FOUNDATION, THE TRADEMARK OWNER, AND ANY DISTRIBUTOR UNDER THIS AGREEMENT WILL NOT BE LIABLE TO YOU FOR ACTUAL, DIRECT, INDIRECT, CONSEQUENTIAL, PUNITIVE OR INCIDENTAL DAMAGES EVEN IF YOU GIVE NOTICE OF THE POSSIBILITY OF SUCH DAMAGE.

1.F.3. LIMITED RIGHT OF REPLACEMENT OR REFUND - If you discover a defect in this electronic work within 90 days of receiving it, you can receive a refund of the money (if any) you paid for it by sending a written explanation to the person you received the work from. If you received the work on a physical medium, you must return the medium with your written explanation. The person or entity that provided you with the defective work may elect to provide a replacement copy in lieu of a refund. If you received the work electronically, the person or entity providing it to you may choose to give you a second opportunity to receive the work electronically in lieu of a refund. If the second copy is also defective, you may demand a refund in writing without further opportunities to fix the problem.

1.F.4. Except for the limited right of replacement or refund set forth in paragraph 1.F.3, this work is provided to you 'AS-IS' WITH NO OTHER WARRANTIES OF ANY KIND, EXPRESS OR IMPLIED, INCLUDING BUT NOT LIMITED TO WARRANTIES OF MERCHANTIBILITY OR FITNESS FOR ANY PURPOSE.

1.F.5. Some states do not allow disclaimers of certain implied warranties or the exclusion or limitation of certain types of damages. If any disclaimer or limitation set forth in this agreement violates the law of the state applicable to this agreement, the agreement shall be interpreted to make the maximum disclaimer or limitation permitted by the applicable state law. The invalidity or unenforceability of any provision of this agreement shall not void the remaining provisions.

1.F.6. INDEMNITY - You agree to indemnify and hold the Foundation, the trademark owner, any agent or employee of the Foundation, anyone providing copies of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works in accordance with this agreement, and any volunteers associated with the production, promotion and distribution of Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works, harmless from all liability, costs and expenses, including legal fees, that arise directly or indirectly from any of the following which you do or cause to occur: (a) distribution of this or any Project Gutenberg-tm work, (b) alteration, modification, or additions or deletions to any Project Gutenberg-tm work, and (c) any Defect you cause.

Section 2. Information about the Mission of Project Gutenberg-tm

Project Gutenberg-tm is synonymous with the free distribution of electronic works in formats readable by the widest variety of computers including obsolete, old, middle-aged and new computers. It exists because of the efforts of hundreds of volunteers and donations from people in all walks of life.

Volunteers and financial support to provide volunteers with the assistance they need, are critical to reaching Project Gutenberg-tm's goals and ensuring that the Project Gutenberg-tm collection will remain freely available for generations to come. In 2001, the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation was created to provide a secure and permanent future for Project Gutenberg-tm and future generations. To learn more about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation and how your efforts and donations can help, see Sections 3 and 4 and the Foundation web page at http://www.pglaf.org.

Section 3. Information about the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

The Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation is a non profit 501(c)(3) educational corporation organized under the laws of the state of Mississippi and granted tax exempt status by the Internal Revenue Service. The Foundation's EIN or federal tax identification number is 64-6221541. Its 501(c)(3) letter is posted at http://pglaf.org/fundraising. Contributions to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation are tax deductible to the full extent permitted by U.S. federal laws and your state's laws.

The Foundation's principal office is located at 4557 Melan Dr. S. Fairbanks, AK, 99712., but its volunteers and employees are scattered throughout numerous locations. Its business office is located at 809 North 1500 West, Salt Lake City, UT 84116, (801) 596-1887, email business@pglaf.org. Email contact links and up to date contact information can be found at the Foundation's web site and official page at http://pglaf.org

For additional contact information:

Section 4. Information about Donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation

Project Gutenberg-tm depends upon and cannot survive without wide spread public support and donations to carry out its mission of increasing the number of public domain and licensed works that can be freely distributed in machine readable form accessible by the widest array of equipment including outdated equipment. Many small donations ($1 to $5,000) are particularly important to maintaining tax exempt status with the IRS.

The Foundation is committed to complying with the laws regulating charities and charitable donations in all 50 states of the United States. Compliance requirements are not uniform and it takes a considerable effort, much paperwork and many fees to meet and keep up with these requirements. We do not solicit donations in locations where we have not received written confirmation of compliance. To SEND DONATIONS or determine the status of compliance for any particular state visit http://pglaf.org

While we cannot and do not solicit contributions from states where we have not met the solicitation requirements, we know of no prohibition against accepting unsolicited donations from donors in such states who approach us with offers to donate.

International donations are gratefully accepted, but we cannot make any statements concerning tax treatment of donations received from outside the United States. U.S. laws alone swamp our small staff.

Please check the Project Gutenberg Web pages for current donation methods and addresses. Donations are accepted in a number of other ways including checks, online payments and credit card donations. To donate, please visit: http://pglaf.org/donate Section 5. General Information About Project Gutenberg-tm electronic works.

Professor Michael S. Hart is the originator of the Project Gutenberg-tm concept of a library of electronic works that could be freely shared with anyone. For thirty years, he produced and distributed Project Gutenberg-tm eBooks with only a loose network of volunteer support.

Project Gutenberg-tm eBooks are often created from several printed editions, all of which are confirmed as Public Domain in the U.S. unless a copyright notice is included. Thus, we do not necessarily keep eBooks in compliance with any particular paper edition.

Most people start at our Web site which has the main PG search facility:

http://www.gutenberg.org

This Web site includes information about Project Gutenberg-tm, including how to make donations to the Project Gutenberg Literary Archive Foundation, how to help produce our new eBooks, and how to subscribe to our email newsletter to hear about new eBooks.

3	Original unaltered recording of telephone conversation with Mr Angus Mead previously submitted to Court & referred to in Judgement comments by Justice Solomon	Separate Attachment in .m4a file format

I, Sandi Matic OF 11 Pearson Place, Floreat in the State of Western Australia, self-employed, duly sworn make oath and say that:

1. I am submitting this affidavit under duress & any errors made due to my non-existent knowledge of how to write in legalese is not to be used against my benefit & I reserve all of my rights.
2. I have suffered a great deal of mental harm as a result of these frivolous and vexatious applications started by the first plaintiff and second plaintiff
3. My family has been subjected to duress and mental harm as a result of these allegations being printed online & in physical newspapers
4. For a period of 8 weeks I faced a serious prospects of homelessness due to inability to obtain accommodation through rental agencies as a result of the false allegations made by Vivian Yap.

Formal Challenge to 12 Presumptions Of Law & Notice of Understanding & Intent to Claim of Right (Separate attachment)

5. I formally challenged the 12 presumptions of law in a sworn affidavit dated 18 July 2022 and submitted it to Chief Magistrate Heath of Perth Magistrates Court of Western Australia
6. The affidavit with challenge to 12 presumptions of law stands unrebutted by Chief Magistrate of Magistrates Court of Western Australia
7. I issued a Notice of Understanding and Intent to Claim of right to Chief Magistrate Heath of Western Australia Magistrates Court Perth in a sworn affidavit dated 18 July 2022
8. The Notice of Understanding and intent to claim of right stands unrebutted by Chief Magistrate of Magistrates Court of Western Australia

Sworn affidavits submitted to Supreme Court of Western Australia (Separate attachment)

9. I have written and affirmed an affidavit titled "Affidavit of Sandi, son of Pavao & Sabina)affirmed on 2nd March 2022
10. The contents of this affidavit are true & correct
11. I submitted to the Supreme Court of Western Australia on 3rd March 2022 a Sworn Affidavit titled 'Affidavit of Sandi, son of Pavao and Sabina' dated 2 March 2022

11.1 Further to this, the same affidavit has been submitted to Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Western Australia on 7th April 2022

11.2 This affidavit stands unrebutted by the plaintiff & plaintiff's solicitors

11.3 This affidavit stands unrebutted by any of the judicial support workers

11.4 This affidavit stands unrebutted by Justice Marcus Solomon

11.5 This affidavit stands unrebutted by Chief Justice Peter Damien Quinlan of The Supreme Court of Western Australia

Affidavit of Sandi Matic with attachments "SM-1"to "Sm-3" affirmed 2 March 2022. (Separate attachment)

12. I swore an this affidavit in response to affidavit by Mr Angus Mead sworn in on 28 March 2022 as part of the CIV 1106 of 2022 in The Supreme Court of Western Australia

13. In this affidavit I rebutted claims made by Mr Mead regarding alleged threats made during telephone calls between Mr Mead and me, Sandi the living man.

14. Attached to affidavit as a transcript of the unedited and original recorded telephone conversation between Mr Mead and me, Sandi the living man.

15. The affidavit & transcript show that no threats were made.

16. This affidavit was claimed to be rebutted by Mr Angus Mead by adding further allegations that the script was manipulated & edited to remove profanity threats.

THIRD AFFIDAVIT OF Sandi, son of Pavao and Sabina WITH ATTACHMENTS "New Recording.m4a" AFFIRMED 11 April 2022

17. Telephone recording was provided to the Supreme Court of Western Australia in a Sworn affidavit dating 11 April 2022

18. This affidavit included verified metadata showing the audio is original and unedited and unaltered

19. The audio recording was also submitted to the Court & to the plaintiff

20. In preliminary judgements for continuance of interim injunction Justice Solomon observed the following in comments 91-94

> 91 The Second Affidavit of Mr Mead, in part, served to respond to this transcript. Mr Mead suggested that the transcript was 'generally consistent with [his] recollection' of the conversation, but that 'some matters have been omitted or edited'. These alterations, according to Mr Mead, included the removal of profanity used by Mr Matic and the removal of statements such as the threat to 'make Vivien feel the pain I am feeling'. The effect of these alterations, Mr Mead's suggested, was to reduce the aggression and hostility he perceived in Mr Matic's tone during the conversation.[31]

92 By consent of the plaintiffs and the court, Mr Matic provided a recording of the phone call of 31 January 2022 via email on 8 April 2022. At the hearing of 12 April 2022, counsel for the plaintiffs accepted that the transcript annexed to the Second Affidavit of Mr Matic was an accurate transcript of the conversation.

93 Having listened to the recording, it cannot be said that the highlighted section was communicated with any particular hostility over and above the rest of the conversation. I did not consider that, objectively, the tone of Mr Matic in the conversation was unduly aggressive.

94 In respect of the conversation of 31 January 2022 the following may be observed:

(a) the conversation was recorded by Mr Matic and accurately transcribed and annexed to his affidavit of 2 March 2022*;*

(b) Mr Mead's recollection of the conversation is not accurate in a number of respects*. His assertion that the transcript has been altered, or parts omitted,* appears to be wrong*; and*

(c) Mr Mead's summary note of the conversation is not entirely accurate. The conversation did not appear to have included statements by Mr Mead that 'I am going to make her pay' or 'feel the pain I currently feel'. Other aspects of the summary appear to be accurate, including the threat to put up billboards and that Ms Yap is the cause of Mr Matic losing his family. Mr Mead's characterisation of Mr Matic as having been 'extremely aggressive' throughout the call is not in my view an objectively fair characterisation of the tone and content of Mr Matic's conduct throughout the call.

SM

21. 5 Additional sworn affidavits were submitted on 13 April 2022 rebutting the plaintiff's claims of contempt of court by defendant.

22. All 5 of these affidavits currently stand unrebutted.

Non Disclosure of Material information as part of ex parte application

23. In these affidavits I have said that Martin Bennet from Bennet and Co (the solicitors for plaintiff) had knowledge of the telephone recording but did not disclose to the court as part of ex parte application.

24. I have made the same claim during the hearings in chambers of Justice Solomon

25. Neither of these claims have been rebutted by Martin Bennetrt.

Requirements of justice between the parties;

26. At the very start of proceedings I offered to sign a mutual undertaking by myself & Vivian Yap to have this matter settled without any further court involvement

27. The mutual undertaking was rejected by plaintiff and their legal council.

28. The inconvenience and injustice & severe harm and constant state of duress caused by these proceedings far outweighs any notion of potential "fear of an act" to be done, especially given the context of the conversation which clearly stipulates that no unlawful action was threatened to be conducted.

Previously submitted conclusions in Seventh Affidavit which stand unrebutted

29. There was no basis for urgency of this application to be granted to be heard ex-parte evidenced by the time that has passed since the original dispute has been raised to the date of application for injunction AS WELL AS, the time that has passed since the alleged comments on the phone and date of application (9 days)

29.34 Initial dispute started in October 2021, no threats of any kind had been made at any time

29.35 The applicant waited 10 days since these alleged threats were made, but could not allow 1 additional day to summon and notify defendant ESPECIALLY GIVEN that no acts of attending home opens had been done nor anything else alleged but instead was all just put to paper by Mr Angus Mead

29.36 Why could the Plaintiff and its Lawyers not done either of the following:

(a) Apply for the injunction sooner (even 1 single day) and summon me to the hearing

(b) Wait an extra day to have the hearing on Friday and serve me with a summons the day prior

30. The chronological order & dates that this was done in was designed intentionally by plaintiffs lawyers in order to try bait me to self-incriminate myself on the phone call on 8th February 2022 and therefore give rise to application being heard ex-parte whilst creating the illusion of urgency in courts eyes to hear the application without the defendant notified

30.1 I was under impression it is illegal for a legal counsel to encourage its clients and witnesses to attempt to obtain illegal evidence?

31. Breached Duty of Disclosure by Mr Bennett & Co

31.1 Mr Bennett knew that recording would contradict the sworn in affidavit by Mr Angus Mead who has committed perjury

31.2 There is and there never was any threat by unlawful or illegal action

31.3 Bennett & Co knowingly submitted evidence which they knew was factually incorrect

31.4 Bennett & Co are further inflicting pain & suffering to myself knowing that their clients statements & claims were fabricated & are acted in a criminal manner.

32. The application to hear the matters ex-parte was given as a special privilege to Mr Bennett based on his standing in the legal community and not based on merit.

33. Intentionally withholding disclosure on initial application for ex-parte hearing, Mr Bennett has acted in bad faith and the temporary injunction needs to be dismissed.

Conclusion:

34. None of the Sworn affidavits submitted by Sandi Matic rebutted and therefore stand unrebutted.

   (a) AN UNREBUTTED AFFIDAVIT STANDS AS TRUTH IN COMMERCE.

   (b) AN UNREBUTTED AFFIDAVIT BECOMES THE JUDGMENT IN COMMERCE.

35. The application for Interlocutory Injunction is frivolous and vexatious & is void due to material non-disclosure.

36. The application for Contempt of Court by Defendant is frivolous, vexatious and is an abuse of process.

37. The plaintiff's applications are lacking in merit or substance as to be not fairly arguable.

38. The plaintiff's applications therefore do not have reasonable prospects of success.

Subject: [EXT] Re: Victorian Wills & Powers of Attorney Registry [SEC=OFFICIAL:Sensitive]

Well what i did was

1. file to register my Power of Attorney documents via State Trustees website.

2. Then i got the below initial reply from State Trustees that it has been done with stating on bottom.

3. then i called that number listed in red and was advised its too busy and to leave a message with my number

4. couple of hours later someone rang my mobile and left a voicemail

5 at around 6PM Victoria time i called back that mobile number and the gentleman state he was the one taht rang back and to email this australia@ssga.com email address and he would follow up next day and send it on elsewhere if needed.

So seeing as i copied both the originator from State Trustees and your team i would hope someone can organize to email me a copy of the document?
